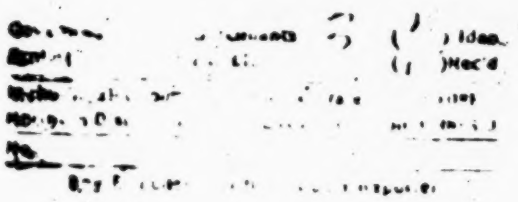
He also stated that whenever possible an arrangement would be made between his client and a broker to sell this broker a shipment of the finished product in exchange for an equivalent amount of raw material. Mr. Busby's client was fully aware that this broker would be forced to sell the finished product for a price in excess of ceiling prices and would be required to pay a price in excess of ceiling prices for the raw material he had agreed to furnish Mr. Busby's client.

This condition existed during the time of sugar rationing, and his client now desired to file amended tax returns and have the matter adjusted with the Internal Revenue Department. However, he did not know and his client did not know the extent of the operations, and therefore, he was unable to assemble the accurate figures necessary to file the amended return.

Mr. Busby said the money obtained from over-the-ceiling sales was in currency and was kept in a safe deposit box and that each time it became necessary to purchase raw materials at over-the-ceiling prices, currency was taken from the safe deposit box and used for that purpose only.

After sugar rationing ended, the money left in the safe deposit box was taken into the corporation books and records and declared as income.



Special Agent Samuel Krane October 16, 1951

I told Mr. Busby that until such time as he was able to obtain accurate figures, his client could not file an amended return, as the amended return would be just as inaccurate as the original return. I suggested that Mr. Busby call all the employees and agents of his client together and obtain statements from each one of them outlining the extent of their individual activity, and from these individual statements he should reconstruct a record of the over-the-ceiling purchases, sales and trades. After this record had been prepared, I suggested that he contact the office of the Internal Revenue Agent in Charge and request an audit of the client's tax returns.

Mr. Busby left my office that day without disclosing the name of his client and without committing himself as to his future action.

After he left, I called Revenue Agent Ralph Johnson on the telephone and gave him the problem and told him what my reply had been. He said that under the circumstances he thought I had given the taxpayer as good an answer as was possible.

Within a few days, Mr. Busby brought Byron Cain, also personally known to me, into my office and told me that Mr. Cain was the President of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company and the Shotwell Manufacturing Company was the client whose case he had discussed with me previously.

Mr. Cain told me practically the same story that Mr. Busby had related previously and I gave Mr. Cain the same suggestion that I had given Mr. Busby. They agreed that they would follow my advice and left my office.

About three or four weeks later, Mr. Cain called me and said that he had had various meetings with the individuals of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company that had any connection with the over-the-ceiling transactions, and that they had reconstructed the figures to the best of their ability and were ready to turn them in to the Internal Revenue Department. He wanted to turn them over to me, but I told him that the Collector's Office had no jurisdiction in the audit of corporation tax returns. He then asked me if I would make the necessary arrangements to have the corporation returns audited.

I told him I would call the office of the Internal Revenue Agent and let him know later. I called Revenue Agent Ralph Johnson and asked if he would make arrangements to have the corporation returns audited. He told me he would do so and I called Mr. Cain and told him to hold the reconstructed figures in his possession and a Revenue Agent would call on the corporation to audit the tax returns and the entire facts and figures should be presented to the Revenue Agent charged with the responsibility for making the audit.

Reference is made to a telephone call received on June 21, 1948, from Special Agent Walter F. Murphy of the New York Division, requesting that certain records and information relating to transactions between General Confections, Incorporated, Eatsum Food Products Company, and the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, be obtained from the Shotwell Manufacturing Company.

The offices of the Shotwell company were visited in the afternoon of June 21, 1948, and on subsequent days, and the following records were obtained and are enclosed herewith:

About thirty days later, Mr. Cain called me and asked if I knew when the Revenue Agent would call. I told him not to be impatient, that the Revenue Agents had a terrific work load and the best thing for him to do was to sit back and wait, and the audit would be taken care of in the regular course of business.

About thirty or sixty days later, he called again and said it was very important to him that the examination be conducted immediately. He intimated that the corporation had some refinancing to do or wanted to make some change in their financial structure, and they were desirous of having this income tax examination completed before proceeding with this proposed change in the financial structure of the corporation.

I again called Revenue Agent Johnson and asked him if he could expedite the examination of the return. He was a little uncertain at first regarding the case, but then he remembered it and said that I had given him the wrong name; that I had told him the name of the corporation was the Shotwell Candy Company, and they had no record of the Shotwell Candy Company and that he had done nothing about having the returns audited.

I told him that the correct name of the taxpayer was the Shotwell Manufacturing Company and that the taxpayer was anxious to have the returns examined because of some proposed change in their financial structure. Mr. Johnson promised me that he would secure the return and assign it for immediate investigation.

That was the last I heard of the case until about a year later, when Mr. Cain called me and said that they had had three Agents, each making a separate investigation, and he wanted to know if there was anything I could do to expedite the closing of the case.

I suggested that he contact Mr. Wright and explain his problem to him. About a week later, Mr. Cain called me again and said he had had an interview with Mr. Wright, and asked me if I could find out the reason why the case could not be brought to a conclusion.

I talked with Mr. Wright and he advised me that the reason the case was not progressing was that Mr. Cain and other employees of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company would not disclose persons to whom the over-the-ceiling money was paid, and that the case would not be closed until the employees of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company cooperated with their Government and disclosed the names of the individuals to whom these over-the-ceiling payments were made.

I conveyed this information to Mr. Cain and he contended that they did not know the names of any of the individuals except a certain Dr. Roe in th. Board of Trade Building, and inasmuch as he felt this was a fictiti us name and he would appear ridiculous in giving a statement of this nature, he had declined to do so, and he was unable to furnish the information requested.

Special Agent Samuel Krane October 16, 1951

I told him there was nothing further that I could do and that is the last time that I have seen Mr. Cain.

This statement is made entirely from memory, and represents my best judgment of the facts. I have reviewed the case with Revenue Agent Marmel eight or nine months ago, and have tried to check dates with Revenue Agent Ralph Johnson, and I believe them to be accurate.

Folder #3. Shotwell Manufacturing Company accounts receivable ledger cards for the Eatsum Food Products Company, and General Confections, Incorporated; a copy of the contract of sale of the capital stock of the Haberhorn Candy Company to the Shotwell Manufacturing Company; a letter, dated December 15, 1947, from General Confections, Incorporated, to the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, and a letter, dated February 18, 1948, from Foses, Katcher and Driessen to Byron Cain.

SI-Special

H. S. Graflund, vice-president of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, stated that he had no knowledge of any transfers of chocolate or sugar in April 1946, by the Shotwell Manufacturing Company to General Confections, Incorporated. A search of the Shotwell files failed to disclose any record of such transfers. Mr. Graflund also stated that such a transaction could not have occurred without the knowledge and approval of Byron Cain, president of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, and/or Frank Huebner, sales manager, who are presently in New York, New York, and who will be interviewed when they return to Chicago next week. However, 21 Shotwell invoices to Eatsum and to General Confections during 1945 and 1946 cover merchandise which was shipped to consignees other than Eatsum or General Confections. Relevant bills of lading and shipping records are attached to these invoices, which are enclosed in Folder #1.

The following information relating to a $75,000 loan by Byron Cain to General Confections was furnished by Mr. Graflund and was substantiated by records examined:

On June 13, 1947, The Sterling National Bank and Trust Company of New York loaned $75,000 to General Confections, Incorporated. Payment of the loan was guaranteed by Byron Cain, who deposited with The Sterling National Bank and Trust Company, as collateral, $85,000 United States of America 7/8% Certificates of Indebtedness, Series A - 1948. Mr. Cain received chattel and real estate mortgages, dated June 13, 1947, signed by General Confections, Incorporated, and Saddle River Farms, Incorporated. These mortgages were recorded on June 14, 1947, at the office of the Clerk of Bergen County, New Jersey, and were deposited by Mr. Cain in a custody account at The Sterling National Bank and Trust Company.

In February 1948, General Confections defaulted on the loan and The Sterling National Bank and Trust Company requested payment from Mr. Cain, who then signed a personal note to the bank for the unpaid balance of $67,000. On March 9, 1948, this note was paid by Mr. Cain. In February 1948, Mr. Cain released the mortgages received from General Confections, Incorporated, and Saddle River Farms, Incorporated (see letter from Poses, Katcher and Driesen in Folder #3), as a result of the purchase by the Shotwell Manufacturing Company of the outstanding stock in the Haberkorn Candy Company. Details of this transaction are contained in the sales contract enclosed in Folder #3.

The following information is being submitted in the belief that it may be relevant to the inquiry being conducted by the New York office:

David G. Lubben, in addition to being a customer of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, acted as its salesman, on a commission basis. Until 1947, commissions were paid to Mr. Lubben in the form of checks (Folder #2); during 1947, commissions earned by Mr. Lubben were paid in the form of credits to the account of General Confections, Incorporated (see ledger sheets in Folder #3).

In December 1947, General Confections, Incorporated, transferred to the Shotwell Manufacturing Company the balance of a purchase contract with the Wilbur Suchard Chocolate Company (see letter in Folder #3). The transfer of this contract resulted in a profit of $11,294.38 to General Confections. This profit was received by General Confections as a result of payments made by Shotwell to the Wilbur Suchard Company for the account of General Confections. It will be noted that whereas Shotwell charged General Confections for specific payments to Wilbur Suchard, the aggregate of these charges was credited to General Confections by a journal entry (see ledger sheets).

Additional information relating to the cancellation of the mortgages herein referred to will be forwarded to the New York office at such time as Byron Cain returns to Chicago.

The enclosed Shotwell records were obtained with the understanding that they would be returned within a reasonable time; it is, therefore, requested that these records be returned to this office as soon as possible.

It is recommended that this report and enclosures be forwarded to the Special Agent in Charge at New York for the attention of Special Agent Murphy.

The Shotwell Manufacturing Company case came to this office as a result of a telephone call received from Walter Murphy, Special Agent, New York Division, on June 21, 1948, requesting that certain inquiries relating to transactions between the Shotwell Company and General Confections, Inc., Hillsdale, New Jersey, and Eatsum Food Products Company, New York, New York, be made that same day. Accordingly, on June 21, 1948, I went to the Shotwell Company and requested the desired information which was obtained and forwarded to the New York Division office by letter dated July 1, 1948. One of the matters included in Mr. Murphy's request, namely the purchase by David Lubben and Edward Urban of the Haberkorn Candy Company, Chicago, caused me to interview Edward Urban, partner in Close and Company, Chicago, on July 15, 1948. Mr. Urban furnished some details of that transaction which information was forwarded to the New York office on August 31, 1948.

On August 20, 1948, Edward Urban, his brother Frank Urban, partners in the firm of Close and Company, and their attorney Joseph F. Solon, 1 North La Salle Street, Chicago, appeared at the office of the Internal Revenue Agent in Charge, Chicago, where they made a purported voluntary disclosure to Group Chief R. Williams of the receipt of approximately $121,000 of over-invoice payments from David Lubben which had not been previously reported on their income tax returns.

Information relating to the purported disclosure by the Urbans of the receipt of over-invoice monies from David Lubben was submitted to the New York Division office by letter dated August 31, 1948. In that letter it was suggested that possibly similar over-invoice payments were received by the Shotwell Manufacturing Company from David Lubben, and the New York Division office was requested to make appropriate inquiries, relating thereto, of Mr. Lubben. Responsive to this letter, Special Agent James J. Twohig, by letter dated September 13, 1948, informed this office that he was in receipt of informa-5687 tion to the effect that the Shotwell Company had made a disclosure to the Revenue Agent's office at Chicago of the receipt of $528,000 of previously unreported income from David Lubben. Upon receipt of this letter inquiry was immediately made at the office of the Internal Revenue Agent in Charge, Chicago, regarding such disclosure by the Shotwell Company as this office previously had no knowledge thereof. The inquiry at the office of the Internal Revenue Agent in Charge, Chicago, disclosed that Internal Revenue Agent J. M. Lima (Ralph Johnson's group) was conducting an examination of the 1946 corporate income tax return of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company. Shortly thereafter a conference was had in the office of Group Chief Ray Williams where Mr. Williams, Group Chief Ralph Johnson, Internal Revenue Agent Joe Lima, and myself, were present, At that conference I learned that the Shotwell Company through its accountant, Leon Busby, and Byron Cain, president, had informed Internal Revenue Agent Lima of over-invoice charges and unbilled shipments to David Lubben's firms and that the monies received from that source were in turn disbursed in order to purchase certain raw materials and that such purchases were not recorded on the books of the Shotwell Company. At the conference it was stated that a recapitulation of these charges, payments received, and disbursements made, had been furnished to Internal Revenue Agent Lima and a copy of same is attached hereto as exhibit 1.

The recapitulation sheet shows that during the years 1944, 1945, and 1946, the Shotwell Company made unrecorded charges to Lubben aggregating $435,600.54 for unbilled shipments and over-invoice charges. The recapitulation sheet shows that only $378,159.24 of the total charges of $435,600.54 was collected from Lubben, the difference being an error in billing of $8,826.40 and $48,614.90 which remained when a final settlement was made with Lubben. The recapitulation sheet also shows that $372,261.24 of $378,159.24 collected from Lubben was disbursed for unrecorded purchases. The balance of $5,898 was deposited in the Shotwell Company account and was credited to an account titled "Advances to Employees".

Shortly after the conference referred to above, held in September, 1948 in Group Chief Ray Williams' office, the case was transferred in the Revenue Agent's office to Group Chief Williams and to Internal Revenue Agent Charles J. Mammel who has since that date continuously conducted an examination of the returns of the Shotwell Com-5688 pany for the years during which said over-invoice payments were received from David Lubben. Internal Revenue Agent Charles J. Mammel has kept me informed of the progress of his investigation.

It is my understanding that the Shotwell Company's position is that no taxable income resulted to it from the receipt of the money from Lubben as they contend that said monies were all disbursed for purchases which were not recorded on its books. However, other than the information contained in the recapitulation sheet submitted to Internal Revenue Agent Lima, the Shotwell Company has refused to submit any specific detailed information relative to the alleged disbursements and Byron Cain, President of Shotwell Company, has stated that such information will not be furnished at any time.

It is my understanding that the Shotwell Company also contends that they have made a voluntary disclosure of these unrecorded transactions to the Bureau of Internal Revenue by virtue of said information having been given orally by Leon Busby, accountant for the Shotwell Company, to Chief Field Deputy Ernest Sauber, Collector of Internal Revenue, Chicago. An examination of the records in the office of the Internal Revenue Agent in Charge, Chicago, shows that the 1946 corporate income tax return of the Shotwell Company, was received by that office on December 11, 1947, assigned to Group Chief Granahan on December 16, 1947, transferred to Group Chief Ralph Johnson on July 21, 1948, and then shortly thereafter transferred to Group Chief Ray Williams. Inasmuch as the specific date on which the alleged disclosure of the unrecorded transactions by Leon Busby to Chief Field Deputy Ernest Sauber is not known to me, I cannot state whether this information was submitted to Mr. Sauber prior to the date when the 1946 income tax return was received by the office of Internal Revenue Agent in Charge for examination.

Considerable correspondence has been received from and forwarded to the New York Division of this Unit by this office relative to the Shotwell and Close and Company cases. Enclosed with a letter dated April 6, 1950, from Special Agent James J. Twohig, is a memorandum of an interview had by Special Agents Cordes and Twohig with David Lubben at the office of the Intelligence Unit, New York, New York, on March 7, 1950. Internal Revenue Agent Charles J. Mammel, Chicago, was also present and participated in this interview. This memorandum which is attached hereto as exhibit 2 relates statements 5689 made by Lubben relative to a meeting had by Lubben and his attorney with Byron Cain and Pat Grace, attorney for Cain. I was informed by Special Agent Twohig when he was in Chicago in December 1949 that Pat Grace was a member of a New York law firm of Grace and Grace which is reputed to be an influential law firm.

I understand that in 1941 or 1942 A. H. Shotwell was the principal stockholder in the Shotwell Manufacturing Company and that the company was then in financial difficulties. Harold E. Sullivan, Chicago, was the attorney for the company.

In either 1941 or 1942 a reorganization was effected whereby all of the old stock was exchanged for new stock. All of the new preferred stock (non-voting) was issued to Mr. Shotwell together with common stock. Fifty-one per cent of the new common stock was issued to Byron Cain, Harold E. Sullivan and Homer Triplett, a partner with Byron Cain in several real estate ventures.

Messrs. Cain, Sullivan, and Triplett paid no money for their stock, receiving the stock in exchange for their assuming management of the company, lending their credit standing so that a loan could be obtained from a bank for working capital, and to induce creditors to grant extensions on outstanding liabilities. Mr. Triplett subsequently sold his stock to Cain and Sullivan for approximately $35,000.

Sometime in 1944 or 1945, the corporation from accumulated earnings purchased all of the preferred stock from Mr. Shotwell and retired it.

Chicago, Illinois
Income Tax: Years 1944-1947

The Internal Revenue Agent in Charge, Chicago, Illinois, has requested that this office cooperate in a joint investigation of the income tax liability of Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Chicago, for the years 1944 to 1947, inclusive.

The investigation conducted by the internal revenue agent has disclosed that the Shotwell Manufacturing Company failed to report the receipt of approximately $400,000 of over-invoice payments from the sale of candy during the years 1944, 1945, and 1946. Officers of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company have acknowledged to the internal revenue agent the receipt of the unreported income but contend that unreported disbursements in a like amount were made in connection with the purchase of certain raw materials used in the manufacture of candy. The officers of the Shotwell company have refused to identify the recipients of the claimed disbursements or to submit evidence to substantiate such payments.

It is requested, therefore, that a case jacket be issued authorizing an investigation of the income tax liability of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company for the years 1944, 1945, 1946, and 1947.

Dear Mr. Culhane:

The enclosed set-up is a brief memorandum and summary outlining the hotels that make up the Abbell Chain. We feel that this is self-explanatory.

However, since there is no hard and fast rule that says that the prospective purchaser would have to buy all of these hotels, it occurred to the writer that your people might be interested in the purchase of the four commercial hotels, namely, the Alexandria of Los Angeles, the Willard of Washington, D. C., the De Soto of St. Louis, and the Paramount of New York. If this were done, their cost per room would be approximately $6,500, which in my opinion is very much in line with prices being paid for similar properties. The above price is based on 1803 rooms at a sale price of $11,750,000. The askind price is based on the terms of 20% cash and the balance in paper. If it were possible to come up with all cash to the present liens, we feel confident that this price can be reduced somewhat.

We have complete up-to-date information and would be very happy to place same at your disposal if you feel that the proposition has any interest for your clients.

There is also a possibility that we may persuade the present owners to lease these houses providing the lessees are a strong group financially and of very good reputation in connection with the management of similar houses. I would like to get your reaction to the above at an early date.

Yours very truly,

1. Testimony of the witness Lubben that he made over-invoice payments in currency, to the defendant, Huebner.

2. Testimony of the witness Lubben, that part of an over-invoice payment was applied to the payment of a personal obligation of the defendant, Cain.

3. Testimony of the witness Lubben relating to checks which he allegedly tendered to the defendants Cain and Huebner, which checks were allegedly payable to Cain, Huebner and Sullivan.

436 4. Testimony of the witness Krasne relating to the delivery of a piece of jewelry to the defendant Cain, which jewelry was allegedly paid for with currency delivered to Krasne by Lubben.

5. Testimony of the witness Feldman, insofar as that testimony relates to the over-invoice payments alleged to have been made, in currency, by Lubben to the defendant, Huebner.

made to such questions in regard to your competency, qualifications, fairness, lack of prejudice and freedom from passion and sympathy, are as binding upon you now as they were then, and should so remain until you are finally discharged from further consideration in this case. It would be improper and unlawful for any of you to disregard the answers that rendered you competent jurors. (Granted)

516 You are the sole judges of the facts of this case. Responsibility rests upon you to determine the facts of this case under the law as the court may give it to you, uninfluenced by any expression of opinion that the court has made or may hereafter make upon matters of fact. The court has not intended at any time during the trial of this case and does not intend at any time to express any opinion on any matter of fact and if the court has expressed or does express any opinion on any matter of fact, you are at liberty to disregard such opinion and it is your duty to disregard it if it is different from your opinion. (Granted)

517 You should not consider any evidence in arriving at a verdict which you have heard but which the court has afterwards stricken from the record, nor should you consider any evidence which has been offered and which the court has refused to receive. You are to disregard all statements of witnesses which the court ordered stricken out, if any. Such statements are not evidence in the case and must not be considered by you. You should not draw any inference whatever from the fact that attorneys in the case have objected during the progress of the trial to questions asked and answers made by witnesses. It is the right of the attorney on either side to object to the introduction of testimony. Such objections raise questions of law to be decided by the court only. (Granted)

518 During the trial evidence has been admitted as applying only to a certain defendant. You may consider that evidence as to the only defendant in reference to whom it was admitted, but not as to any other defendant or defendants. (Granted)

519 This matter comes before you upon an indictment in which it is charged, in two counts, that the defendants, Byron A. Cain, Frank J.J. Huebner, Harold E. Sullivan, and

The Shotwell Manufacturing Co., a corporation, have committed certain offenses under the laws of The United States. The mere fact that the defendants have been indicted is not to be considered by you as any evidence of guilt; an indictment is merely the means by which each defendant is brought into court to answer the charges made. The indictment does not give rise to any presumption of guilt because under our laws, it is a mere accusation, and also because every defendant who is accused of a crime is presumed to be innocent. Such presumption of innocence remains with him throughout the entire trial, through the arguments of counsel and until you have retired to the jury room to deliberate on your verdict. Each of the defendants here is entitled to the benefit of that presumption and it is for each of you alone to determine, after you have heard all the evidence, the arguments of counsl and these instructions, whether or not the guilt of any one or more defendants has been established beyond a reasonable doubt. (Granted)

520 The jury are the sole judges of the credibility of the witnesses, what weight should be given to the testimony of each witness, and in determining their credibility you may take into consideration their interest, bias or prejudice, if any, as shown by the evidence, their relationship to the parties, the probability or improbability of their story, together with all other facts and circumstances in evidence which is your judgment adds to or detracts from the weight of their testimony. (Granted in Substance)

521 If you believe from the evidence that any witness in this case has knowingly and wilfully testified falsely on this trial to any matter material to the issues in this case, you are at liberty to disregard the entire testimony of such witness except insofar as you find that it has been corroborated by other credible evidence or by facts and circumstances proven on the trial. (Granted)

522 In considering this case and in passing upon your verdict you are not required to set aside your own common observation and experience as men and women in the affairs of life, but, on the other hand, you have a right upon consideration of all the evidence in this case, in the light of your own common observation and experience as men and women in the affairs of life, to say where the truth lies upon any material fact in this case. Harold E. Sullivan by: William T. Kirby
His Attorney

523 The defendants and each of them have entered pleas of not guilty to this indictment and to each count of it. The effect of the pleas of not guilty is to deny each material allegation of such count of the indictment and to place on the Government the burden of proving each material allegation of each count of the indictment as to each defendant by competent and believable evidence beyond and to the exclusion of every reasonable doubt. If the Government has filed to prove, as to any defendant, each material allegation of each count of the indictment or either of them, beyond and to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt, or if you are in doubt as to whether the Government has so proven each material allegation of each count of the indictment, or either of them, as to any defendant, then it is your duty to acquit that defendant as to such count or counts of the indictment as to which the Government has failed to make such proof beyond a reasonable doubt. (Granted in Substance)

524 Each of thesee ounts is a separate and distinct charge against each defendant, and it is necessary that you consider each count of the indictment separately and that you consider the guilt or innocence of each of the defendants separately as to each count. It is just as though you were trying eight separate cases. You must take up and consider separately each of these cases as you find that the evidence bears on each of them. Your verdict must be unanimous as to each count and as to each defendant regarding which you render a verdict. (Granted)

525 Part of the evidence before you is what is known as circumstantial evidence. Circumstantial evidence is that sort of evidence by which the inference of an unknown fact is drawn from the existence of known facts. Circumstantial evidence should be received and acted upon with the utmost caution and before you are warranted in convicting upon circumstantial evidence there must be such a well connected and unbroken chain of circumstanes as to exclude all other reasonable hypotheses but that of guilt. "Hypothesis" means simply supposition or theory. The attendant circumstances must not only be consistent with guilt but they must also be inconsistent with innocence. (Withdrawn)

526 Since each of the individual defendants is charged with wilfully and knowingly attempting to defeat or evade a large part of the taxes due and owing to the United States from the corporate defendant, by the filing or causing to file of false or fraudulent income tax returns for the corporate defendant, you must find such a defendant not guilty unless you are satisfied by the evidence beyond and to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt that he caused erroneous income tax returns to be filed by the corporate defendant in a wilful and knowing attempt to defeat and evade a large part of taxes which were due and owing to The United States from the corporate defendant and which such individual defendants knew were so due and owing. (Revised by Counsel and Granted as Revised)

527 The intent in this case is one of the essential elements. It is not sufficient for you to find that the return was erroneous and that there was an intent to file a return that was actually erroneous. You must find a defendant not guilty unless you are satisfied by the evidence beyond and to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt, that he or it had the specific wrongful intent required for conviction, that is to say, actual knowledge of the existence of the obligation to pay the tax and the wrongful intent to evade it. In considering whether any one or more of the defendants had this specific wrongful intent to evade taxes due and owing to The United States from the orporate defendant for the years 1945 and 1946 you may consider all the circumstances connected with the filing of the income tax returns for those years. (Granted in Substance)

528 The crime for which the defendants are charged in either count of the indictment requires the Government to prove, beyond a reasonable doubt, that such defendant had the specific intent to violate the provisions of the federal income tax law in the manner charged in such count. It is not sufficient for the Government to show that any such defendant intended to violate the OPA or any other federal law unless the Government also shows that said defendant also intended to violate the federal income tax law. (Granted in Substance)

529 The specific intent to violate the provisions of the federal income tax law which must be proven beyond all reasonable doubt as to any defendant is not equivalent to, or proven simply by proof of a specific intent to violate the OPA law or any other federal law. (Granted in Substance)

443 And on the same day, to wit, the 1st day of October, 1953 came the Defendants, Harold E. Sullivan, Byron A. Cain and Frank J. Huebner by their attorneys and filed in the Clerk's office of said Court their certain Motion, And Affidavit of Frank J. Huebner in words and figures following, to wit:

MOTION

The defendants, Harold E. Sullivan, Byron A. Cain and Frank J. Huebner, hereby renew and supplement their motion for a mistrial orally presented to the Court in the above-entitled cause at the opening of court September 25, 1953, predicated upon the publication in the Chicago Daily Tribune, in its morning paper for Friday, September 25, 1953, of the article heretofore offered and received in evidence as Defendants' Exhibit A of September 25, 1953.

And by way of supplement, said defendants aver that at the conclusion of the morning session of September 25, 1953, the Court made the statement and gave the directions to the jurors as will more fully appear from the transcript of the record in the above-entitled cause, but that the nature of said article is such that its prejudicial effect could not be cured by said directions or instructions, or by any other direction or instruction.

Also, by way of supplement, these defendants say that the substance of said article was broadcast over a Chicago radio station to the public on Friday, the 26th day of September, 1953.

445 Defendants represent that the said article and its publication, aforesaid, is prejudicial in its nature as a matter of law to the said defendants, and to each of them, and would so prejudice any of the jurors who may have read said article or have heard the said broadcast.

In the alternative, the said defendants say that such of said jurors who may have read the said article, or heard the said broadcast, may have in fact been prejudiced in such manner as to make it impossible for said defendants to receive a fair trial.

Wherefore, said defendants ask that the Court poll the jury to ascertain: First, which if, any of said jurors have read the said article or heard the said broadcast; and, Second, to ascertain whether such as have done so, or any of them, are thereby prejudiced so that they cannot give the defendants a fair trial.

In partial support of said motion, said defendants attach hereto the affidavit of Frank J. Huebner.

AFFIDAVIT

Frank J. Huebner, being first duly sworn on oath deposes and says that on Friday, the 25th day of September, 1953, he heard a broadcast over Chicago radio station WGN of a news item purporting to summarize the same subject matter as is involved in the newspaper article mentioned in the above and foregoing motion, but that he was unable at the time to make notes as to the precise statements which were made in said broadcast.

530 The questions is, members of the jury, whether you are convinced from all the evidence that there were taxes due the Government for the years in question in amounts substantially higher than those reported and paid by the corporate defendant to the Government, and whether you are further convinced from all the evidence that there was a wilful attempt by the defendants in such years to evade or defeat any substantial part of such income tax by filing or causing to file false and fraudulent returns for the corporate defendant for said years. (Revised by Counsel and as Revised Granted in Substance)

531 You must acquit the defendants if you find that although the corporation had income which it did not report, the defendants, in good faith, did not believe such income to be taxable. Mere failure to report income in the absence of a specific wrongful intent is not a crime. The knowledge of the existence of the obligation and a wrongful intent to evade it is of the essence, and unless you are convinced beyond and to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt that this essential of the charge existed, your verdict must be not guilty. (Withdrawn by Counsel)

532 The net income figure on a tax return is normally the result of a rather extensive series of computations. For purposes of this case, however, these computations can be considerably simplified. For purposes of this case, you may assume that the taxable net income of the corporate defendant for the years in question was the difference between the corporation's receipts from sales (that is to say, its income) and the cost of the goods sold. (Granted in Substance)

533 If the sales were understated, and if the cost of goods sold was correctly stated, the taxable net income of the corporate defendant was understated by the amount, if any, that the sales were understated. However, if both the sales and the cost of goods sold were understated, then the net income was understated only to the extent, if any, that the understatement of sales exceeded the understatement of the cost of goods sold. In other words, unreported expenditures for goods sold or used in the manufacturing process offset unreported sales. For example, if a corporation fails to report $100,000 of sales, and if it correctly reports all of its costs, then the taxable net income of the corporation has been understated by $100,000. On the other hand, if the corporation also fails to report $100,000 expended for goods sold or used in the manufacturing operations then both the taxable net income and the tax due have in face been correctly reported. (Granted in Substance)

534 The testimony as to the cash payments made to the corporation depends upon the credability of the Government witnesses who gave that testimony. You have already been instructed regarding the factors which you may consider in passing upon the creditability of a witness. In this connection, you are again instructed that if you find that a witness has lied to you as to any material matter, then you are at liberty to disregard all of his, or her, testimony, except insofar as you find that it has been corroborated by other creditable evidence or by facts and circumstances proven on the trial. (Granted in Substance)

535 The only issue on trial before you is that contained in the indictment which charges the defendants with attempting to evade income taxes owed by the Shotwell Manufacturing Co., a corporation. The indictment does not accuse the individual defendants—Byron Cain, Harold Sullivan and Frank Huebner—of attempting to evade income taxes owed by them personally, nor is such issue before you. Any cash payments made by Eatsum, Reserve Trading and General Confections may be considered in support of the Government's case only if they constituted taxable income to Shotwell Manufacturing Co., a corporation. To the extent you find from all the evidence that any cash payments for overages were received by individual defendants for their own benefit then to such extent such payments would constitute income to such individual defendants, and did not constitute taxable income to the corporation itself, namely, Shotwell Manufacturing Company. (Modified by Counsel and Given by the Court as Modified)

536 You must not permit any violations of the other laws by the defendants to prejudice you against them or any of them. The fact, if it be a fact, that the defendants or some of them committed offenses against the price control laws of The United States creates no presumption that such defendant or defendants committed the offenses here charged against him or them. (Granted in Substance)

537 The question of the civil liability of the corporate defendant for taxes due for the years 1945 and 1946 is not in question. It is not an issue in this ca It is not to be considered by you in determining the issues in this case. The outcome of this case in no wise effects the Government's rig to proceed against the corporate defendant or the individual defendants in civil proceedings if it believes any additional taxes may be due to the Government from any one or more of them. (Granted in Substance)

538 To the extent, if any, that the jury may find, if it does, from all the evidence that overage payments were in fact made, the mere fact that overages were paid is not sufficient to warrant a conviction. It is also necessary to warrant a conviction that payments of such overage be found to have been made under such circumstances, and in such a manner, that they constituted income to the corporate defendant ratner than income to the individual defendants or any or either of them for their own use and benefit. (Withdrawn by Counsel)

539 The Government has introduced into evidence many records which purport to be records kept by David Lubben in connection with his various enterprises. The defendants have produced witnesses who testified that many of these records were not in existence at the time they were supposed to have been made and that they were subsequently made by Lubben for the purpose of blackmailing the defendants. As the sole judges of the weight to be given the evidence, if you believe, from the testimony ,that any of these records were fabricated by Mr. Lubben, you are at liberty to disregard all of the records involved except insofar as you find that some of them have been corroborated by other credible evidence or by facts and circumstances proven on the trial. (Granted in Part)

540 The summaries made by witnesses have no independent value as evidence. Such summaries are entitled to weight as evidence only to the same extent that you choose to give weight to the testimony of the witnesses or the books and records upon which the summaries are based. If you choose to disregard as evidence all or a part of the testimony of such witnesses or of the correctness of such books and records, then you must likewise disregard so much of the summaries of the witnesses as are based on the testimony of such witnesses and the books and records you decide to disregard. (Modified by Counsel as Indicated and Granted as Modified)

541 Testimony as to conversations with any one defendant is to be considered by you only as to such defendant and may not be considered by you as to other defendants not present even though other defendants are mentioned therein. (Granted)

542 You are instructed that if you find from all the evidence that the persons, partnerships, or corporations which are alleged to have made overceiling payments to officers or employees of the corporate defendant knew, or should have known, at the time that any one or more of such payments were made, that the officer or employee receiving the payment did not intend to pay the money over to the corporate defendant, then such payment or payments as were not actually paid over to the corporation did not constitute taxable income to the corporate defendant. (Withdrawn upon No. 22 Being Given)

543 If you find that cash payments, in substantial amounts, were made to officers and agents of the corporate defendant by Eatsum, Reserve Trading and General Confections, and that these payments constituted, in substantial amounts, income to the corporate defendant, you must then consider whether such income was offset by unreported payments made by the corporate defendant for goods sold or used in its manufacturing operations. The taxable net income of a corporation is essentially its sales (or income) minus the cost of the goods sold. In consequence, unreported costs of goods sold offset unreported income for purposes of determining taxable net income. (Granted in Substance)

544 The cost of goods sold is such an offset even if that cost represents overceiling payments. That is to say, if a business concern bought raw material at overceiling prices during the OPA period, it is entitled to deduct, as a cost of goods sold, the entire purchase price, both ceiling price and overceiling premium. The corporation is therefore entitled, in determining its net income for the years 1945 and 1946, to an offset or deduction for any unreported overceiling premiums which it paid for raw material purchased by it during the years 1945 and 1946. The corporation is entitled to this offset or deduction even though the unreported payment was not made to the seller of the goods. For example, if corn refineries would not sell corn syrup to the corporation unless the corporation would procure (or cause to be sold) a certain amount of corn to them at ceiling prices, overceiling premiums paid for the corn so procured and so sold to the refineries is deductible as a part of the cost of the corn syrup obtained from the refineries. (Granted in Substance)

545 You are further instructed that although in the years 1945, 1946 and 1947 the Treasury Department held that overceiling payments for raw materials were not deductible as a part of the cost of goods sold, the courts have since held that they may be so deducted and that it was always the law that they could be deducted, and accordingly the Treasury abandoned its position and acquiesced in such court decisions after the indictment was returned in this case, and it is the law that such payments are deductible as part of the cost of goods sold. Therefore, you are instructed that in determining the corporation's net taxable income for the years 1945 and 1946, you must deduct such sums as you may find were paid out by the corporation for procurement of raw materials as part of the cost of goods sold, even though such sums represented overceiling payments, and even though the Treasury Department was not permitting such deductions for the taxable years 1945 and 1946 at the time that the returns for those years were filed by The Shotwell Manufacturing Company. (Granted in Substance)

546 In determining whether the corporate defendant made such unrecorded overceiling payments for raw material purchased, you may consider circumstantial evidence. Thus, you may consider conditions in the corn syrup industry and in the grain markets when determining whether the corporate defendant in fact made overceiling payments for the procurement of corn as claimed by the defendants. Similarly, you may consider circumstantial evidence in determining the dollar amount of any overceiling premiums which the corporate defendant may have paid for the procurement of corn required to obtain corn syrup or other corn products. (Modified by Counsel Granted in Substance)

547 If you find from the evidence that there were "trade deals" by which the corporate defendant sold some of its merchandise at ceiling in return for the sale to it by the customer or some third party, of raw materials at ceiling prices, you are instructed that no income to the corporation resulted therefrom. (Granted)

548 Since The Shotwell Manufacturing Co., a corporation, is charged with wilfully and knowingly attempting to evade, by the filing of false and fraudulent returns, the income taxes which it owed to The United States for the years 1945 and 1946, you must acquit it unless you are satisfied, beyond and to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt, not only that it filed erroneous returns which understated its taxable net income but also that it knew, at the time the returns were filed, that they fraudulently understated its taxable net income. Now since a corporation may act or obtain information only through its officers and agents, the law generally imputes to a corporation the knowledge which its officers obtained in the course of the performance of their duties. However, the knowledge of an officer or agent is not imputed to a corporation as to matters regarding which the interests of the agent or officer are adverse to those of the corporation. Thus, if any officer of the corporate defendant was diverting cash payments into his own pocket, as to those payments his interests were adverse to those of the corporate defendant, with the result that his knowledge of the receipt of the payments is not imputed to it. In consequence, if you conclude from all the evidence that any one or more officers of the corporate defendant diverted cash payments to his or their personal use, then you must acquit the corporate defendant unless you find that some other responsible officer whose interest was not adverse know that its taxable net income was intentionally understated on its returns for the purpose of avoiding a tax which he knew the corporation owed. (This was submitted as an alternative to Request No. 56. The Court having Granted Request No. 56 in Substance, No Ruling Was Requested on this Request)

549 It is not necessary that the Government prove evasion of all the taxes charged in the indictment. It is necessary, however, in order to warrant a conviction as to any one of the defendants that the Government prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the income taxes reported and paid by the corporate defendant were intentionally understated by a substantial amount. Thus, all of the defendants must be acquited under Count I of the indictment unless you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the taxes owing to The United States with respect to the corporate defendant's income for the year 1945 were understated by a substantial amount. Similarly, all of the defendants must be acquited under Count II of the indictment unless you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the taxes owing to the United States from the corporate defendant for the year 1945 were understated by a substantial amount. (Granted in Substance)

550 The corporate income taxes levied by the federal government were imposed upon the "net income" of a corporation. In effect, therefore, the requirement that the Government prove that the income tax owing by the corporate defendant is understated by a substantial amount, means that the Government must prove that the tax return of the corporate defendant understated its taxable net income by a substantial amount. Thus, all of the defendants must be acquited under Count I of the indictment if you believe that the taxable net income of the corporate defendant for the year 1945 was not substantially greater than that shown on its return for that year. Similarly, all the defendants must be acquitted under Count II of the indictment unless you believe that the taxable net income of the corporate defendant for the year 1946 was substantially greater than that shown on its return for that year. (Granted in Substance)

551 In determining whether the defendants, Byron A. Cain, Harold E. Sullivan, Frank J. Huebner, and The Shotwell Manufacturing Co., or any one or more of them, had this specific intent to defeat or evade taxes owing to The United tSates, at the time that the tax returns of the corporate defendant were filed, you may take into account evidence showing the corporation of the defendants with Government agents during their investigation of the affairs of the corporate defendant. In considering the evidence relating to such corporation, or the lack of it, you may take into account the fact that throughout the period during which that investigation was conducted, the Treasury took the position that overceiling payments made for raw materials were not deductible as a part of the cost of goods sold. That is to say, it was then the position of the Treasury Department itself that overceiling payments by the corporate defendant, and the identity of the person or persons to whom such payments were made, were irrelevant insofar as the tax liability of the corporate defendant was concerned. (Granted in Substance)

552 In determining whether the defendants, Byron A. Cain, Harold E. Sullivan, Frank J. Huebner and The Shotwell Manufacturing Co. or any one or more of them had a specific intent to defeat or evade taxes owing to The United States from the corporate defendant at the time the tax returns of the corporate defendant for the years 1945 and 1946 were filed, you may take into account, together with all other evidence bearing on the issue of intent, the actions of the defendants pursuant to the voluntary disclosure policy. (Granted in Substance)

553 Evidence of good character and reputation is competent evidence in favor of a defendant as tending to show that he would not be likely to commit a crime alleged against him in the indictment. If the jury believes from all the evidence, that prior to the alleged commission of the alleged crime, any defendant had always borne a good reputation as a man of honesty and integrity among his acquaintances and in the community, this is a fact to be considered by the jury with all the other evidence in the case in determining the question whether the witnesses who testified to facts tending to incriminate that defendant, were mistaken or had testified falsely. (Granted in Substance)

554 You are instructed that the good reputation of a defendant for honesty and integrity may itself be sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt as to that defendant's guilt. (Granted)

555 In addition to these eight verdicts, that is to say, a separate verdict as to each defendant on each count of the indictment, you should also return three special findings. These findings will consist of answers —yes or no—to the following questions:

1. Did the corporate defendant, during the year 1945, pay out for corn or other raw materials all of the money paid over to it by the officers and agents who received over-invoice payments?

2. Did the corporate defendant, during the year 1946, pay out for corn or other raw materials all of the money paid over to it by the officers and agents who received over-invoice payments and/or payments for unreported sales?

3. Were all payments, if any, made during the year 1946 for unreported sales paid over to the corporate defendant by the officers or agents receiving such payments?

4. Did Lubben believe, during the time that he or his companies were making over-invoice payments for goods purchased from the corporate defendant, that such payments were going, in whole or in part, to one or more of the individual defendants rather than to the corporate defendant? (Denied)

556 The mere fact that the defendant was an officer and director of the company did not charge him with knowledge of the contents of the books and records of said corporation, and he cannot be charged with knowledge of any of the entries on said books in the absence of proof of actual knowledge. (Granted in Substance)

557 You Are Hereby Instructed that an officer of a Corporation cannot be held criminally responsible for the criminal acts of a corporation which are performed through other officers and agents who are not acting under his direction and control. (Granted in Substance)

558 You are instructed that the fact that any of the defendants was an officer and director of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company during a portion or during all of the time here involved is not itself proof of willful and knowing intent to defraud the Government. A director or officer is not bound by the acts or representations of other officers or employees unless and until it is shown that he knowingly and willfully intended to adopt such act. Nor is an officer or director criminally accountable for the acts of other officers or agents of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company unless such acts were done at his direction or under his control. (Modified by Counsel and as Modified Granted in Substance)

559 You Are Hereby Instructed that before an officer of a corporation, no matter how great his responsibility, may be found guilty of a crime involving specific criminal intent or guilty knowledge, it is essential that that officer of the corporation actually and personally do the acts constituting the offense, or that they be done under his direction and control and with knowledge that they are being performed. Therefore, you may not find any of the defendants here guilty of the offenses charged in the indictment merely because he was an officer of the corporation, no matter how great his responsibility, unless you first find that he actually and personally did the acts constituting the offense or that they were done by his direction, under his control and with actual knowledge. (Granted in Substance)

560 You Are Hereby Instructed that the offsenses charged in the indictment requires the specific intent to willfully evade income taxes with knowledge, and you may not find any of the defendants guilty of the offenses charged in the indictment merely because he was an officer of the corporation, no matter how great his responsibility, nor may he be held criminally liable for the acts of the corporation performed through other officers or agents who were not acting under his direction and control and with knowledge of those acts. (Granted in Substance)

561 The Jury is instructed that it is their duty to consider each defendant separately and to bring in a separate verdict of "Guilty" or "Not Guilty" as to each defendant, and as to each count with which he stands charged in the indictment. (Granted)

562 You are justified in your consideration of the evidence in drawing reasonable inferences from proven facts, but inference cannot be based on inference. A finding of guilt cannot rest on pure conjecture nor is merely some evidence sufficient. A verdict of guilty must be based on substantial evidence which leaves an abiding conviction that the accused is guilty. Guilt must be established by competent evidence beyond a reasonable doubt, and, in the absence of such evidence or where the evidence is as consistent with innocence as with guilt, no conviction can properly be had. (Granted in Substance)

563 The guilt of an accused is not to be inferred because the facts proven are consistent with his guilt, but on the contrary, before there can be a verdict of guilty you must believe from all the evidence, and beyond a reasonable doubt that the facts proven are inconsistent with his innocence. If two conclusions can reasonably be drawn from the evidence, one of innocence and one of guilt, you should adopt the one of innocence. (Granted in Substance)

564 You Are Instructed that where a conviction for a criminal offense is sought upon circumstantial evidence the prosecution must not only show by evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the alleged facts and circumstances are true but it must appear that such facts and circumstances are true but it must appear that such facts and circumstances are incompatible with any reasonable hypothesis other than that of the guilt of the accused. Unless there is substantial evidence of facts which exclude every reasonable hypothesis but that of guilt the defendant must be acquitted. Evidence of facts that are as consistent with innocence as they are with guilt is insufficient to warrant a conviction. In order to warrant a conviction on circumstantial evidence all the circumstances must be consistent with each other, consistent with the hypothesis that the accused is guilty, and inconsistent with the hypothesis that he is innocent. Where the conclusion from the circumstances proven permits any rational conclusion of innocence, there is no proof of guilt. If you find, upon an impartial consideration of all the evidence in the case, that there are two reasonable theories supported by the evidence, and that one of such theories is consistent with the guilt of a defendant and that the other of such theories is consistent with the innocence of that defendant, then the law makes it your duty to adopt that theory which is consistent with the innocence of said defendant and to find that defendant not guilty. (Granted in Substance)

565 The court instructs the jury that a defendant is under no obligation to testify in his own behalf and that his neglect to testify shall not raise any presumption against him, or any of the other defendants.

The court instructs the jury that they shall not consider the failure of any of the defendants to testify in this case nor shall they draw any presumption of the guilt of any defendant because of his failure to testify. (Modified as Indicated by Counsel, Granted as Modified)

566 If you find from all of the evidence that at the time of the filing of the corporate income tax returns for the years 1945 and 1946, respectively, any individual defendant or defendants in good faith believed that all unreported income of the corporation for those years had been disbursed for unreported expenditures for raw materials, then you must find such individual defendant or defendants not guilty even though you also find that all of such unreported income of the corporate defendant had not, in fact, been so expended. (Modified by Counsel and as Modified Granted in Substance)

567 In considering your verdict, if you find after due deliberation that you can agree on the guilt or innocence of any defendant or defendants and cannot agree on the guilt or innocence of other defendant or defendants, you are instructed that you may render your verdict as to the defendant or defendants upon whose guilt or innocence you can agree. (Granted)

568 From the standpoint of the corporate defendant, the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, there is one question which requires special consideration; that is, whether the conduct of the individual defendants is to be considered the conduct of the corporation. I must instruct you as to the applicable law governing this question.

A corporation is a distinct legal entity. Since it is impersonal, it must have officers and agents to act for it, and in determining whether a corporation is liable for the acts of persons as its agents, precisely the same principles apply as if the corporation were a natural person who employed an agent or agents to act for him.

The general rule is that any act done, or admission or declaration made, within the agent's scope of authority is binding upon his principal. This general rule has been applied in a situation where the agent was not expressly authorized by his principal to do what was done or to say what was said but where he had, at least, apparent authority, and a third person believed he was acting for his principal and not for himself. The reason for this rule is that in such a situation, where the agent is acting merely for his principal, it is presumed that anything done or said by the agent while so acting is the same as if it were said or done by the principal.

However, there is a well recognized exception to the general rule, and that is when an agent has a personal interest in the transaction which is adverse or inconsistent with that of his principal. Then the agent's conduct, admission or declaration cannot be considered as the principal's. For when an agent does something or says something in his own interests and against the interests of his principal, what such agent does or says cannot be considered the deeds or statements of his principal.

It is up to you to decide whether or not these individual defendants did or said the things which the Government alleges they did, if at all, for their own personal interests, or whether they were acting in the interests of the corporation; that is, in the interests of all of the stockholders collectively. Unless you are convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the individual defendants were not acting in their own individual interests, you cannot consider their conduct or admissions as binding upon the corporation.

In order to find the Shotwell Manufacturing Company guilty of an attempt to evade taxes, you must be convinced beyond a reasonable doubt not only that there was a tax due and owing but also that the corporation had knowledge of this obligation and wrongfully intended to evade payment.

Therefore, if you find that the individual defendants, or any of them, in any transaction or transactions had a personal interest adverse to that of the corporation, then whatever guilty knowledge or wrongful intent, if any, was possessed by that defendant or defendants with respect to the transaction or transactions cannot be imputed to the corporation. (Granted in Substance)

MOTION OF HAROLD E. SULLIVAN FOR ACQUITTAL

Now comes Harold E. Sullivan, one of the Defendants herein, at the close of all of the evidence, and moves that a judgment of acquittal of the offsenses charged in the indictment and each of them be entered and that he be discharged for the following reasons:

1. That there is no evidence that the defendant, Harold E. Sullivan, willfully, and intentionally attempted to evade the payment of the Income Taxes of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company as charged in the indictment.

2. That there is insufficient evidence to submit any of the issues to the jury with respect to the defendant Harold E. Sullivan in that all of the evidence tending to prove that the defendant Harold E. Sullivan willfully, knowingly and intentionally sought to defeat the payment of the Income Taxes of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, as charged in the indictment, is purely circumstantial and there are one or more reasonable hypotheses under the evidence which supports a reasonable inference that the 580 deefndant, Harold E. Sullivan did not willfully, knowingly and intentionally seek to evade the payment of the Income Taxes of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, even if the Government's proof is to be taken as true.

3. That the evidence against the defendant, Harold E. Sullivan is as consistent with innocence as it is with guilt.

4. That there is no substantial evidence even considering all the evidence in the light most favorable to the Government that the defendant, Harold E. Sullivan willfully, knowingly and intentionally sought to evade the payment of the Income Taxes of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company.

5. That there is no evidence, circumstantial or direct, which tends to prove that the defendant, Harold E. Sullivan, was an active and efficient actor or participant in the filing of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company's Income Tax Return for the years 1945 and 1946, nor that he had any knowledge of the circumstances surrounding the filing of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company's Income Tax Returns for said years.

6. That there is not sufficient evidence to warrant his conviction in that the Government has failed to prove facts sufficient to constitute a prima facia case; and further has failed to prove any criminal intent on the part of the defendant, Harold E. Sullivan.

and[1] by his counsel

589 And afterwards on, to wit, the 26th day of October, 1953 came the Defendants, The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, a corporation, Byron A. Cain and Frank J. IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
Northern District of Illinois
Eastern Division

* * (Caption—No. 52 CR 143) * *

MOTION FOR A NEW TRIAL

Now come the defendants, The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, a corporation, by Thomas C. McConnell, its attorney, and Byron A. Cain and Frank J. Huebner, by Vincent O'Brien, their attorney, severally, and move the Court for a new trial on each count of the indictment, on the following grounds:

1. The Court erred in sustaining the plaintiff's demurrer to the defendants' motion as amended for the dismissal of the indictment and in denying said motion as amended.
2. The Court erred in denying the defendants' additional motion to dismiss the indictment.
3. The Court erred in denying the defendants' motion to amend and supplement Section 4 of the motion to dismiss.
4. The Court erred in denying the defendants' written motion as amended to suppress evidence.
5. The Court erred in making the finding of fact and in holding the propositions of law incident to its denial of defendants' said motion to suppress evidence.
6. The Court erred in failing to grant the motion of defendants, filed September 2, 1953, (R746) for the 591 production of certain statements of Government witnesses, in so far as the statement of Daniel Tobias is concerned.

7. In its voir dire examination of the jury, the Court erred in failing to interrogate concerning the following matters, as suggested in writing by the defendants:

(a) Whether any juror was solicited to become a member of the panel, or whether any juror himself caused his name to be submitted to the Jury Commissioners or anyone else as a prospective juror?

(b) Whether the jur have read anything in the newspapers concerning this case or the defendants, and, if so, whether they thereby gained any impressions which might have a bearing one way or the other on their consideration of this case?

(c) Any defendant in a criminal case as a matter of right may or may not take the stand as he chooses. Should any defendant in the case at bar elect not to take the stand and to testify whether that would be a circumstance which would in any way influence his verdict?

8. The Court erred in denying the motion of the defendants for a mistrial, made at stenographic transcript page 1320, based upon Lubben's statement in the presence of the jury that "these payments were admitted last December," etc.

9. The Court erred in failing to grant defendants' motion for mistrial, filed September 27, 1953, based on a newspaper article prejudicial as a matter of law and shown at Record 3155-57 to have been read by one of the jurors.

10. The Court erred in denying, at Record 3059, the motion of the defendants, presented in writing at 592 Record 2989, to strike certain testimony given by the witnesses Lubben, Krasne and Feldman.

11. The Court erred in admitting any part of the Cain testimony given at the disclosure hearing.

12. The Court erred in excluding certain portions of the testimony of Cain at the disclosure hearing which his attorney asked be read to the jury along with the portions which counsel for the Government asked be so read. (Record 3019-3055). The Court's statement for the Record 4745-47, the Court's memorandum at 4748-4756, and the defendants' exceptions at 4757-4758, are related to the same matter..

13. The Court erred in ruling that the supposed admissions by Cain at the disclosure hearing were admissible against the corporate defendant.

14. The Court erred in failing to grant the defendants' motion, made at Record 1812, to strike the testimony of Heitman as to payment of $10,000 in 1945. (Record 2983-87)

15. The Court erred in failing to admit in evidence the Cunningham affidavit, Defendants' Exhibit 53. (Record 4193)

16. The Court erred in denying the defendants' motion to strike Lubben's testimony as to a payment of $36,148.35. (Record 2988)

17. The Court erred in denying the twice made motions of said defendants that a judgment of acquittal be entered as to Count I of the indictment on the ground that the evidence adduced by the Government was insufficient to sustain a conviction, an in denying the further motion of the defendant corporation for judgment of acquittal as to Count II of the indictment on the same ground.

18. The Court erred in unduly restricting the scope of defendants' cross-examination of the witness Lubben
593 and of other witnesses, and the Court erred in rejecting certain evidence proffered by the defendants, and in denying offers of proof made on their behalf having to do with the following matters:

(a) The credibility of the witness.

(b) The motives of the witness.

(c) The verity of the books and records maintained by the witness or company or companies with which the witness was identified.

(d) The financial position and history of Lubben, and his expenditures as bearing upon the question as to whether he retained for his own use cash withdrawn from his companies. (Record 1366-84 et al.)

19. The Court erred in taking into consideration the evidence adduced before it on the motion to suppress, and in attempting to limit the defendants on the trial of the general issue to matters which in its judgment were consistent with its recollection of the evidence at the prior hearing. (Record 1079, 1121-41)

20. The Court erred in unduly and improperly restricting the scope of the defendants' proof as to the voluntary disclosure policy of the Treasury Department, and as to action taken by them in attempted compliance therewith, (Record 4158, et seq.) and in its ruling on Defendants' Exhibits 96, 97, and 98.

21. The Court erred in preventing the defendants from proving the disclosure policy and their compliance with the conditions thereof as part of the surrounding circumstances which they were entitled to establish for the purpose of explaining supposed admissions at the disclosure hearing, as to which the Court permitted the plaintiff to make proof, and as to which it permitted the plaintiff
594 on cross-examination to utilize certain documents allegedly submitted by Busby subsequent to the making of their disclosure.

22. Under the circumstances, the Court erred in giving its instructions to the jury on the subject matter of disclosure, in that it thereby limited the jury's consideration of the entire subject matter to the issue of intent.

23. The Court erred in permitting the plaintiff to use in evidence or for purposes of direct examination or cross-examination, any of the documents supplied to the plaintiff after the disclosure made by and on behalf of the defendants to Agents of the Treasury Department.

24. Having erroneously limited the defendants' disclosure evidence and its consideration by the jury to the narrow issue of intent, and having permitted the plaintiff to avail itself of certain of the evidence at the prior disclosure hearing on the sole doctrine of testimonial admissions for the purpose of showing unreported taxable income as of the time of the alleged disclosure, the Court erred in permitting the plaintiff on cross-examination and otherwise to go into matters having to do with premium payments as distinguished from premium receipts, matter which was utterly irrelevant in so far as the determination of additional tax was concerned, and matter which had nothing to do with either the issue of intent or the supposed admission of unreported receipts. Under the law then in effect, and having in mind the defendants expressed willingness to pay upon receipt of a bill and the Treasury's position as expressed to them that there could be no deduction for payouts, the plaintiff's examination of the witnesses Busby and Cain was immaterial, irrelevant and, prejudicial insofar as it involved an inquiry into the subject of payouts, whether on the issue of intent or on the doctrine of admissions.

595 25. In charging the jury, the Court erred when it spoke of payments made as money due to Shotwell, thereby ignoring the point that as a matter of law mere proof of payment to officers of a company under the circumstances at bar, is insufficient to show that the payments constituted income to Shotwell, except to the extent and over the period during which moneys were deposited in the corporation's boxes. Also, and to the extent that there could as a matter of law be any issue of fact on the proof at bar, the Court by said charge foreclosed the issue of fact as to whether the payments were income to Shotwell.

26. The Court further erred in its charge to the jury in erroneously assuming that knowledge by an officer that payments were not recorded on the books was equivalent to knowledge or would support an inference of knowledge that they were not adequately dealt with on the income tax returns.

27. In its charge to the jury, the Court undertook to summarize the defendants' contentions, but in so doing completely omitted all reference to their contention that the initial transactions in the indictment period had to do with trade deals as to which there were no overages.

28. The Court erred in failing to give defendants' Instruction 22 in substance as it was suggested. At Record 5359, the Court interpolated into said instruction the statement "but payments to a corporation and received by it for goods sold by it on the so-called black market do constitute revenue for tax purposes." And the Court erroneously interpolated other matters in the giving of said instruction in such way as to dilute it beyond the point of any real significance or adequacy.

29. The Court erred in failing to charge the jury that they must consider not only what overages were paid by Lubben, but what portion of those overages, on the 596 basis of the Government's evidence, constituted income to Shotwell.

30. The Court also erred in failing to charge the jury, with respect to any balance of overages that might have existed over and above what was paid out for corn, that they must determine what portion, if any, of that balance constituted taxable income to Shotwell.

31. The Court erred in failing to charge the jury in substance as requested by defendants' suggested Instructions 45 and 47.

32. By the latter portion of its charge at Record 5386-5388, the Court, for all practical purposes, nullified its preceding instructions and purported to substitute an inadequate and over-simplified statement of the issues in a manner patently prejudicial to the defendants, which in no way could be avoided or cured by the mere interpolation of the words: "in light of these instructions,"—meaning the preceding instructions. In so doing, the Court erred and its action in this respect was tantamount to a direction to the jury to find the defendants guilty.

33. As shown by the record, the defendants complied with the provisions of Rule 30, having to do with the filing of written requests for instructions. The Court passed upon the requests as so made and informed counsel of its proposed action prior to the arguments to the jury. The substance, form and order of the Court's charge to the jury, however, was such as to make it impossible for the defendants fully to state their objections in the short time allowed before the retirement of the jury. The instructions were not given in the order in which requested; they were not given in the language requested; there were interpolations by the Court between instructions, and even within the context of individual instructions, in such manner as to charge or affect the meaning of the instructions, and in such way as to make it difficult and even im-597 possible to determine whether the instructions which were to be given, were in fact given. The Court attempted to summarize the issues, and to some extent, the evidence. The summaries were not complete, and sometimes inaccurate. The adverse effect was not avoided by the Court's statement that the jurors should rely on their own recollections where those were at variance. Some of the jurors may have had no recollections on the matters involved. The defendants submit that the procedure employed was contrary to the intent and spirit of Rule 30.

34. The defendants assert errors in the Court's rulings on evidence in the following specific respects:

(1) The Court erred in admitting in evidence as Government exhibits the cash checks, cash authorization slips, memoranda and markedup invoices which were received over the objections of the defendants that they were unauthorized, self-serving and not binding upon the defendants and that insufficient foundation had been laid.

(2) (Record 431) In admitting invoices 18-A and B, of 1944, which were beyond the scope of the bill of particulars,—not cured by statement that the cash was received in 1945 since the company was then on an accrual basis.

(3) (Record 495) Government Exhibit 27-A, received over the same objection.

(4) (Record 628-29) Government Exhibit 73, over objection that insufficient foundation laid to explain absence of original and that only the face of the check and not the reverse side was available.

MOTION IN ARREST OF JUDGMENT.

The defendants, The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, a corporation, by Thomas C. McConnell, its attorney, and the defendants, Byron A. Cain and Frank J. Huebner, by Vincent O'Brien, their attorney, severally move the Court to arrest the judgment because the Court is without jurisdiction or right to conduct a trial of the general issue since it should have granted the motion of the defendants to dismiss the indictment, including that part of their motion which sought to bar the action by reason of immunity from criminal prosecution on account of the voluntary disclosure aforesaid.

MOTION OF THE DEFENDANTS, THE SHOTWELL MANUFACTURING COMPANY, A CORPORATION, BYRON A. CAIN and FRANK J. HUEBNER, FOR JUDGMENT OF ACQUITTAL NOTWITHSTANDING THE VERDICT.

The defendants, The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, a corporation, by Thomas C. McConnell, its attorney, and the defendants, Byron A. Cain and Frank J. Huebner, by Vincent O'Brien, their attorney, severally move for judgment of acquittal notwithstanding the verdict, on the following grounds, to-wit:

1. The Court erred in denying their motion to amend Section 4 of their motion to dismiss as amended.

2. The Court erred in denying their motion to dismiss as it was amended, and in later denying their additional motion to dismiss.

3. The Court erred in denying their motion to suppress evidence.

4. The Court erred in entertaining and in permitting the use of material evidence encompassed in their motion to suppress evidence as aforesaid.

5. The Court erred in receiving in evidence on the trial of the general issue any part of the testimony 610 or evidence adduced at the hearing of the motion to suppress evidence.

6. The evidence adduced at the trial is insufficient to sustain a conviction of any of said defendants of the offense charged in either count of the indictment.

7. There is no evidence showing that the corporation in fact received unreported income as charged, except such as was received and administered by non-defendant officers and employees of said corporation, as to all of which the uncontradicted evidence is that such receipts were paid out as part of the cost of materials for goods sold by the corporation, and thus did not constitute taxable income. On the facts at bar, there is on presumption of law that other receipts, if any, by individual defendants constituted income to the corporation. The evidence adduced by the plaintiff affirmatively indicates that such other receipts were intended for and received by such officers for their own use and benefit.

MEMORANDUM DECISION.

The above-named defendants filed a motion to suppress all evidence obtained from them by the agents of the Government subsequent to their alleged disclosure in January, 1948, and the motion involves not only the suppression of any statements or admissions made by any of the defendants, but also all information and data obtained from the books, records, and documents belonging to the corporate defendant. The Court heard the evidence submitted by the defendants in support of their motion, and that offered by the Government in opposition thereto. At the close of the hearing on November 21, 1952, the Court announced that the motion would be denied and an order of denial was thereupon entered upon the minutes of the court. The Court reserved the right, however, to file a memorandum or formal findings of fact and conclusions of law in the event it later seemed necessary or advisable. The trial of the matter now having been concluded and the jury having found all of the defendants guilty on 619 both counts of the indictment, the Court desires to set forth in a memorandum his views with reference to the motion to suppress.

It is the defendant's position that the use of any information divulged to the agents of the Government by the defendants or obtained by the agents of the Government from the books, records and documents belonging to the corporate defendant after their alleged voluntary disclosure, would be a violation of their rights under the Fourth and Fifth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

Defendants rely upon the former voluntary disclosure doctrine as enunciated in various public announcements of the officials of the Treasury Department and the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The so-called doctrine must be culled from the many statements, press releases and pronouncements of the officials in that no formal regulations or procedures in this regard were adopted by the Treasury Department or the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Reference to isolated statements made by various government officials as to what had to be done by a tax evader to obtain immunity in a tax prosecution may be entirely misleading. Considerable difficulty has been encountered in applying the so-called doctrine because of the many versions and interpretations which may be gleaned from press reports and public pronouncements attributed to various government officials charged with the enforcement of the income tax laws. And without attempting to formulate the doctrine in concise language from a reading of the various pronouncements referred to by the defendants and upon which they contend they relied in making their disclosure, it seems evident therefrom that at least the doctrine contemplated a situation where a taxpayer confesses his wilfull tax evasion to one or more of the designated government agents before any investigation is commenced by the Government and evidences his good faith by aiding and assisting the Government in obtaining the payment of the taxes due.

620 When Mr. Cain and Mr. Busby, the latter being the Shotwell Company's accountant, conferred with Mr.

Sauber, the then Chief Deputy Collector for the First Internal Revenue District of Illinois, they merely indicated to him that there were unreported receipts obtained by the Shotwell Company in black market operations which were completely offset by unreported deductions for raw materials. And to the end that an amended tax return might be filed disclosing that situation, they sought the aid and advice of Mr. Sauber. Both Mr. Cain and Mr. Busby maintained to Mr. Sauber that the premium receipts were washed out, so to speak, by the premium payments made in connection with the goods that were sold and to the extent that there was any difference as between premium receipts and premium payments, such balance was reported in the 1946 corporation income tax return. There was no disclosure of an intentional tax violation or any disclosure of an intent to defraud the Government. Cain contended that he assumed in good faith that the premium receipts were offset by the premium payments made, and hence no taxes were due. Moreover, he contended that he did not know of any contrary ruling by the Treasury Department until Mr. Busby told him of such ruling. At most, therefore, the disclosure assumed to indicate nothing more than that there was a necessity of filing amended tax returns so that the corrected receipts and corrected payments for goods manufactured might be set forth therein and thus reconcile the items of net profits which had already been reflected in the net income for 1946. At no time during any of the alleged disclosure did the defendants disclose any unreported net income.

Defendants heretofore made a motion to dismiss the indictment on substantially the same grounds urged herein. This motion was heard by Judge Barnes and denied. In the affidavit in support of said motion submitted by Mr. Cain, it appears that he stated that he and his associates always maintained that the defendant corporation owed no tax over and above the amount reported in the 621 1945 and 1946 income tax statements. The claimed willingness of the defendants to pay any tax due the Government upon the assumption that the Commissioner's ruling regarding the non-deductibility of black market payments for raw materials required such tax payment, did not constitute an admission of a wilfull tax evasion. At most, according to the position of the defendants, the situation which was presented to Mr. Sauber was due to misunderstanding on their part resulting from their alleged good-faith belief that such payments were deductible and hence there were no additional taxes due the Government. Mr. Cain's gesture of accepting Mr. Lubben's figures of the total amount of overages paid to Shotwell and then fabricating fictitious payments for raw material to offset such receipts, indicates the entire absence of good faith in defendant's alleged disclosure. If they feared some civil assessment for a tax deficiency because the Treasury Department at that time had refused to recognize deductions for black market payments for the purchase of goods, nevertheless they indicated their reservation of the right to challenge such ruling. Consequently, it seems clear that here we have no disclosure of anything on which these defendants could be prosecuted. There was no admission of any tax fraud or any intent to violate the tax laws of the Government.

If the Government is to promise immunity, it must be in a situation where there is disclosed a wrongdoing on the part of the taxpayer, not merely a disclosure of good-faith errors in his return. Obviously, if the situation is one where there is no wrongdoing and no tax due the Government, there can be no dependency upon immunity under the so-called voluntary disclosure doctrine. If the defendents' alleged disclosure of the factual situation were true, there could be no criminal prosecution.

The very purpose of the voluntary disclosure doctrine was to obtain the payment of taxes of which the Government has been defrauded. The doctrine necessarily 622 contemplates a contrite taxpayer who confesses his fraud and evidences good faith in aiding and assisting the Government in obtaining the payment of the taxes due. This basic element of a voluntary disclosure within the enunciated government policy is entirely lacking here. As indicative of the lack of good faith on the part of the defendants, the evidence discloses that some of the records which would be illuminating and helpful in determining the true situation with reference to defendants' black market operations were destroyed at the instance of Mr. Cain, and no bona fide attempt was made by any of the defendants to reconstruct destroyed or incomplete records in order to determine the amount and the persons to whom any premium payments were made for raw materials. The figures which were submitted to the Government agent in this regard were admittedly fictitious and submitted solely for the purpose of indicating that premium receipts were completely wiped out by the premium payments. In fact, the evidence indicates that Mr. Cain, during the various conferences with the Government agents, took the position that he would not under any circumstances disclose to whom any premium payments were made by Shotwell for raw materials, and thus he attempted to foreclose any investigation by the Government as to the verity of the claim of such payments.

The defendants urge that, under the so-called voluntary disclosure doctrine, the question of immunity does not rest in the discretion of the Government officials, but that there is an open promise of immunity by the Government in the event the taxpayer by his voluntary disclosure comes within the purview of the announced doctrine. But if that view is sound, defendants have, under the evidence submitted, fallen far short of presenting a factual basis for the application of the doctrine by the Court.

In addition, defendants urge that any disclosure made, written or otherwise, and the evidence obtained therefrom, must be suppressed because such disclosure was in-
623 duced by a promise of immunity, express or implied, by the Government agents. I am convinced from the evidence produced on the motion that no promise of immunity was held out to these defendants, or any of them, by any representative of the Government when these alleged disclosures were made, or at any other time. Moreover, I am satisfied that there were no representations by any Government representative which would lead these defendants to believe that the alleged disclosure would be considered a voluntary disclosure within the purview of the voluntary disclosure doctrine. And the evidence will not sustain a finding that any Government representative held out to the defendants, or any of them, that there would be no criminal prosecution by reason of the so-called voluntary disclosure.

And, in passing, reference may be made to the results of the trial on the merits which took place in September and October, 1953, when the jury found, and the evidence convincingly established, that large sums of black market receipts received by the Shotwell Company were never paid out for raw materials on the black market or elsewhere during 1945 and 1946. The jury's verdict of guilty necessarily requires a finding that a substantial tax over and above that which was paid by the Shotwell Company for 1945 and 1946 was due the Government by reason of the unreported premium receipts received by Shotwell during 1945 and 1946. What a travesty it would be if, under such circumstances, immunity should be granted to the defendants because of the alleged disclosure which had only one purpose and that was to mislead and to misinform the Government agents of the true facts. False statements and fraudulent representations made to Government agents under the pretense of a voluntary disclosure can never constitute the basis for immunity from criminal prosecution under any possible interpretation of the so-called voluntary disclosure doctrine.

I find, therefore, that the defendants have failed to 624 sustain the burden of proof in establishing that a voluntary disclosure was made by them within the purview of the so-called voluntary disclosure doctrine. In view of this finding, I do not find it necessary to make any finding as to the exact date when the Government first commenced its investigation of the Shotwell Company's income taxes for the years in question.

The above may be considered as the Court's findings of fact on defendants' motion to suppress, and the same may be and is hereby made a part of the order of this Court of November 21, 1952, denying defendants' motion to suppress.

An exception is reserved to the defendants.

ORDER DENYING MOTION OF THE SHOTWELL MANUFACTURING COMPANY, BYRON A. CAIN, AND FRANK J. HUEBNER FOR A NEW TRIAL.

The defendants The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Byron A. Cain, and Frank J. Huebner have filed a motion severally for a new trial on each count of the indictment on the grounds indicated in their notice of motion. Some 79 grounds are urged in support thereof. The Court does not deem it necessary to comment upon the numerous grounds urged in support of the motion. Suffice it to say that any error or irregularity which may have occurred during the trial did not affect the substantial rights of the defendants. These defendants were accorded a fair trial, and on the evidence the jury was fully justified in finding them guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. The verdict of the jury should not be disturbed by this Court. Therefore,

ORDER DENYING MOTION OF DEFENDANT HAROLD E. SULLIVAN FOR JUDGMENT OF ACQUITTAL.

This cause came before the Court on the motion of defendant Harold E. Sullivan for acquittal notwithstanding the verdict of the jury. The Court deferred ruling on the motion, and now has considered the briefs filed by the movant and the Government in opposition thereto.

At the outset, it is evident that the jury found from the evidence that the Shotwell Company had received as income substantial sums of so-called black-market money during the years 1945 and 1946 which was not expended for raw materials, and hence it constituted taxable income. This money was in no way reflected on Shotwell's books, and although a portion of it may have been expended, as defendants contend for raw corn, the jury's verdict requires a finding that a substantial part of the money paid by Lubben to Shotwell during these years was utilized by Shotwell for other purposes. Moreover, it seems evident from the jury's finding herein that they believed that Lubben was telling the truth when he recounted his deal-632 ings with these defendants.

In considering the sufficiency of the evidence as to defendant Sullivan, we commence, therefore, with the premise that all of the over-ceiling payments thus made by Lubben during the years 1945 and 1946 constituted income to Shotwell. The individual defendants concede that all moneys received from Lubben constituted income to Shotwell, but their position is that all of the money was obtained by Shotwell during a limited period in 1945 and 1946 in order to facilitate the purchase of raw corn for Shotwell's benefit. While Sullivan denies that he had anything to do with the cash box which was maintained by Shotwell for corn purchases, he admits that he knew of these over-ceiling payments, and it is his position that Shotwell had to accept them in order to stay in business. He contends that the company needed such extra moneys in order to enable it to buy raw corn at over-ceiling prices and to ship the corn to manufacturers, and thus obtain the critical material of corn syrup with which to manufacture candy. Under the evidence, the jury was fully justified in finding that a substantial portion of the payments made to Shotwell was never used for the purchase of raw corn and that the defense of Sullivan, as well as the other defendants, that all of such income was utilized for such purposes was utterly unpersuasive and palpably a subterfuge to cover up the machinations of these individual defendants. When it is recognized that the jury found that substantial sums of overages paid were never used to buy raw corn and never recorded, all of the circumstances justify a finding beyond a reasonable doubt that Cain, Huebner and Sullivan obtained in some method substantial sums for their own use from these over-ceiling payments which were made to Shotwell by Lubben. Moreover, that Sullivan admitted receiving some of the cash thus paid is a perfectly reasonable inference to be drawn from the conversation that he had with Lubben in September or October of 1946. It is true that Lubben, when he

that it occurred when he tendered the three checks, Government Exhibits 14, 14-a and 14-b. Later, before cross-examination, however, he stated that he was mistaken as to the date of the meeting with Sullivan and that the conversation with him took place later in the year when he was having difficulty in making some of his payments to Shotwell. His so-called recanting did not, as defendant Sullivan contends, destroy the credibility or weight of his testimony in this regard. On the contrary, the demeanor and attitude of Lubben under the circumstances tended to strengthen one's belief that he was honestly and faithfully relating the conversation which had taken place, but as to which, in first giving this testimony, he was mistaken as to the time and the circumstances. In any event, it seems clear that the jury must have believed Lubben's testimony in this regard. Now, this conversation with Sullivan as related by Lubben disclosed that Sullivan knew that these over-ceiling payments in violation of the O.P.A. laws were not recorded on Shotwell's books. This is apparent; otherwise, he would not have been concerned as to whether such data appeared on Lubben's books. Sullivan knew, as a lawyer, that if Shotwell's books reflected over-ceiling payments, he, as well as Cain and Huebner, might be involved in civil and possibly criminal proceedings. Moreover, it is quite apparent from Sullivan's own testimony during the trial that he was fully aware that none of these over-ceiling payments were recorded on Shotwell's books. On page 4665 of the record appear the following questions and answers when Sullivan was examined:

"Q. Didn't you know it would have to be kept off the books or the OPA investigators would locate it?

A. That was true after—that wasn't true after June of 1945 when the OPA went off, or am I right—1946, June 30th.

634 Q. How about the period prior to that?

A. Certainly it had to be kept off the books or you would be subject to perhaps additional trouble. I know that now. I didn't know it then. I don't believe.

Q. Well, are you sure?

A. Am I sure about what?

Q. You said you don't believe you knew it then. Are you sure you didn't know it then?

A. I don't ever remember discussing it. I am not positive.

Q. Of course you knew that if it was off the books for OPA purposes, it was also off the books for Internal Revenue purposes, didn't you?

A. Not necessarily. Not necessarily."

These equivocal answers are fairly subject to only one interpretation, and that is that Sullivan was fully aware of the fact that Lubben's transactions with reference to over-ceiling payments were not recorded on the books of the Shotwell Company, and as attorney for the company he was fully cognizant of the reasons for such non-recording. Sullivan's contention that he assumed in good faith that all of the cash received in over-ceiling payments was disbursed for raw corn is not convincing in view of the testimony as to the period over which these payments extended, and in view of the testimony given by Lubben to the effect that Sullivan admitted that he was utilizing some of these payments for his own use. What else could Sullivan have been referring to if Lubben correctly recounted this conversation? Lubben stated in his testimony that Sullivan said to him when Sullivan had been assured that these over-ceiling transactions had not been recorded on Lubben's books, "Well, Dave, you know how it is. You have a place in New Jersey, farm in New Jersey. This money I have been using in my farm—I am getting a new driveway put in—that is the only way I can do it today with the tax situations the way they are." In view of 635 the circumstances related at the trial, the jury was fully justified in finding that Sullivan must have known that all the over-ceiling moneys received by Shotwell were not going for the purchase of raw corn if he himself was the recipient of a portion of it. And Lubben's testimony as to this admission of Sullivan is entirely consistent with the overwhelming weight of the testimony. One could not hear the testimony in this case without obtaining an abiding conviction that the overages paid by Lubben to Shotwell began in late 1944, not when the corn shortage developed in late 1945, as Sullivan contends. And the jury was fully justified in concluding from the evidence that a substantial part of such payments to Shotwell was appropriated by Sullivan, Cain and Huebner for their own use. The evidence reflects that in 1945 Shotwell received over $177,000 and in 1946 over $276,000 by way of over-ceiling payments from Lubben. All such over ceiling payments by Lubben to Shotwell were made in cash, and Sullivan was cognizant in that fact. If Sullivan was aware of any cash overages being made, he must have been aware, contrary to his contention, of all the cash overages paid to Shotwell which extended from late in 1944 to and including all of 1946. Any other deduction from the testimony is wholly untenable.

Sullivan was attorney and a director of Shotwell in 1945 and Executive Vice President and attorney in 1946, and in 1946 Cain and his family and Sullivan and his family owned some 65 percent of the common stock. Cain, Huebner and Sullivan were the three dominant executives of this company. Sullivan was paid a salary by Shotwell of $30,000 in each of the years 1945 and 1946. The amount of Sullivan's salary during the years in question, and all of the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, fairly indicate that he must have played a dominant part in the affairs of the company. He testified that he talked to Huebner about the plan of having Lubben pay over-636 ceiling prices for candy sold to him by Shotwell in order to buy raw corn, and he contended on the witness stand that Shotwell's cash on hand could not be utilized for that purpose on account of the tax obligations of Shotwell and hence the money had to be obtained from over-ceiling sales to Lubben. While the alleged reasons for obtaining the over-ceiling payments were obviously untrue; the circumstances indicate that Sullivan was not a mere figure-head. As an Executive Vice President, he was active with Cain and Huebner in formulating the policies of the company. And Ericson, superintendent of Shotwell in 1945 and 1946, stated that, although his memory was not clear as to the officials present when the unbilled shipments plans was inaugurated to cover up Shotwell's over-ceiling violations, he was clear that he would not have shipped except on instructions of Cain, Sullivan or Huebner.

The jury was justified in finding that Sullivan, Cain and Huebner knew that a substantial part of the over-ceiling payments would not be recorded on the books of the company and was not used for purchases of raw corn, and that they knew that, in view of the circumstances, it would logically follow that such sums would not be reflected in the 1945 and 1946 tax returns of the company. In order to find otherwise, a jury would have to be extremely naive and credulous.

Under all the evidence, direct and circumstantial, it seems uncontroverted that Sullivan knew that the income of Shotwell diverted to him would never be included in Shotwell's income tax returns. How could any reasonable person expect any other result if he was a party to a scheme and plan to divert unrecorded corporate income surreptitiously to his own use? Under these circumstances, the Court concludes that a reasonable-minded jury could find beyond a reasonable doubt that Sullivan intentionally and knowingly participated in and aided a scheme and plan, with reference to a substantial portion of 637 these over-ceiling payments made by Lubben to Shotwell, which would exclude such payments from the income reflected in the tax returns of the Shotwell Company for the years 1945 and 1946.

Defendant Sullivan urges with great earnestness that the evidence, direct and circumstantial, does not constitute substantial proof of his guilt, as distinguished from merely some evidence or a scintilla of evidence which may point thereto. But the question of substantial evidence is not to be determined merely by the quantity of the evidence introduced with reference to the defendant. Concededly, the various transactions of Lubben with the Shotwell Company over the period of years in question with reference to the overages paid and the circumstances thereof as related in the testimony, refer to Sullivan far less than to defendants Huebner and Cain. But notwithstanding the comparative paucity of the evidence which refers directly to Sullivan and his complicity in the offenses charged, the direct and circumstantial evidence which does appear is substantial and fully susceptible of a finding that it is consistent only with that of guilt. In passing upon the motion for acquittal, the Court, in view of the verdict of the jury, must consider the evidence in the most favorable light to the Government and must also recognize that when circumstantial evidence is strong and convincing, it may become an entirely satisfactory basis upon which to find a verdict of guilt.

In this proceeding there was a mass of testimony to consider and many intricate legal questions to solve, and before determining defendant Sullivan's motion for acquittal, the Court deemed it advisable to defer such ruling until further consideration could be given to the question presented. Upon such further consideration and reflection, I am clear that the jury's verdict as to this defendant should not be disturbed. I conclude, therefore, that the motion of defendant Sullivan for acquittal must be denied.

It is so ordered.

MOTION FOR ENTRY OF ORDER AS TO TIME FOR FILING A MOTION FOR A NEW TRIAL.

Now comes the defendant, Harold E. Sullivan and shows that heretofore on October 17th, 1953, the following occurred as appears from pages 5481 and 5482 of the Record:

"By Mr. Kirby: Now, your Honor, with respect to the defendant Sullivan, may all of the same orders appear—apply, I should say, in the event the motion for acquittal is denied, but with the time being extended?

By the Court: If the motion for acquittal is denied, but with the time being extended?

By the Court: If the motion for acquittal is denied, then I will impose sentence on defendant Sullivan and I will make such order then. I think I will make such orders then as I think necessary.

By Mr. Kirby: We can take it up then. The only problem that it presents is this: That the statute with respect to a motion for a new trial does key it, your Honor, to the date of the verdict and therefore, could we have an extension—

By the Court: Well, I haven't any objection to an order extending your right to make a motion for a 645 new trial within ten days after I impose sentence on the defendant Sullivan, if I deny your motion for acquittal."

That there should have been entered in the Clerk's Docket as of that date an order allowing the defendant Sullivan an order extending the right of the defendant Sullivan to make a motion for a new trial to any date prior to ten (10) days after imposition of sentence on the defendant Sullivan, but that through inadvertence such order was not entered and that it should be entered nunc pro tunc as of October 17, 1953.

Wherefore this defendant prays that such an order be entered as of October 17, 1953.

MOTION OF HAROLD E. SULLIVAN FOR A NEW TRIAL.

The defendant, Harold E. Sullivan, files this motion for a new trial pursuant to the terms of the order of October 17, 1953, extending the time for filing said motion for a new trial, and without waiving any other motions; the defendant moving for a new trial for the following reasons:

1. The Court erred in denying the defendant Sullivan's motion for acquittal made at the conclusion of the Government's case.

2. The Court erred in denying Sullivan's motions made at the conclusion of the Government's case that Sullivan

   a. Be permitted to rest his case, and

   b. Be granted a judgment of acquittal, and

   c. If such acquittal be not granted, then be allowed a severance so as to go to the jury on the record as it then stood against the defendant Sullivan.

648 3. The Court erred in denying defendant Sullivan's motion for acquittal made at the conclusion of the evidence.

4. The verdict is contrary to the weight of the evidence.

5. The verdict is not supported by substantial evidence.

6. The Court erred in admitting documentary evidence for the Government not made by the defendant Sullivan or by or under any control, authority or knowledge of the defendant Sullivan, or under circumstances making same binding or admissible against defendant Sullivan.

7. The Court erred in admitting testimony of witnesses as to the alleged acts and statements of persons, made out of the presence of Sullivan and not under circumstances making same binding or admissible against defendant Sullivan.

8. The Court erred in admitting testimony of witnesses on matters as to which objections were made by counsel for the defense.

9. The Court erred in sustaining objections to questions put by counsel for the defense on cross examination of the Government's witnesses.

10. The Court erred in sustaining objections to cross examination of counsel for the defense which cross examination sought to use the contents of documents marked "Defendant's Exhibits".

649 11. The defendant Sullivan was substantially prejudiced and deprived of a fair trial by reason of, amongst other things, the attorney for the Government arguing the case against all of the defendants by the use of evidence which was not admitted against the defendant Sullivan.

12. The defendant Sullivan was substantially prejudiced and deprived of a fair trial by reason of, amongst other things, the admission into evidence of material not competent or admissible against Sullivan and which material had a prejudicial effect against Sullivan not cured by any instruction and which material the Government knew would be used and would prejudice Sullivan.

13. The Court erred in refusing to admit documentary evidence tendered by the defense.

14. The Court erred in restricting the defense in the proofs that were sought to be made with respect to the disclosure question.

15. The Court erred in the summarization of the positions of the Government and of the defendants (and particularly of the defendant Sullivan) which was given in the Court's charge.

16. The Court erred in instructing the jury that the presumption of innocence only remains until such time as "the Government has established his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt", which instruction starts at Transcript 5316.

650 17. The Court erred in its summary by repeated reference to the arrangements as being made between the Shotwell Company and Lubben and by repeated reference to the monies coming to Shotwell.

18. The Court erred in its summary at Transcript 5325 in referring to a "conference with the defendants Cain, Sullivan and Huebner" at the Pennsylvania Hotel early in 1945; when there was no such conference; and this is particularly important in view of the question of the time when Sullivan first had any business conferences, or knowledge of business conferences with Lubben, as to overage payments.

19. The Court erred in summarizing the Government's contention, and again in summarizing the defendant's contention, in leaving out all specification of the start of the "trade" deals, although such deals were unquestioned at least in the beginning and were important.

20. The Court erred in its summary of the contentions of the defendant in that such summary is incomplete, inaccurate in some respects, and overlooked important matters relied upon, at least by the defendant Sullivan, as to the limited matters covered by the proof as to him.

21. The Court erred in his summary of the defendant's position particularly when the Court discussed with the jury the Cain admissions made orally and in writing, such errors consisting not only in the summary itself not stating fully the situation relating to such admissions orally and in writing, but further the jury would assume from the Court's including those matters in his gen-
651 eral discussion of the position of the defendants that such matters were binding upon or admissible against or could be considered in connection with the defendant Sullivan, although such matters had expressly not been offered by the Government with respect to the defendant Sullivan and were not in any way competent or in the record as against him.

22. The Court erred in his summary to the jury of the factual matter, particularly at the final summary beginning at page 5354 where he attempted to summarize the whole position of the defendants but that summary is incomplete and is particularly objectionable so far as the defendant Sullivan is concerned.

23. The Court erred in referring (at page 5347) to simply the language of the statute, for that is misleading in that form, particularly as coupled with the language defining a "person", making reference to its officers and certain duties of officers, and the coupling with the language of the aiding and abetting statute.

24. The Court erred in quoting verbatim the Aiding and Abetting Statute, as it did at Transcript 5348.

25. The Court erred in its instructions with respect to intent, and what proof would be sufficient to show intent, such instructions allowing improper presumptions to be made and improper inferences to be made.

26. The Court erred in its instruction with respect to the question of the money received in and paid out by the Shotwell Company in that said instruction does 652 not place the burden of proof upon that issue upon the Government but could be understood by the jury to put the burden of proof upon that issue upon the defendant.

27. The Court erred in the instructions given, with respect to the instruction, in its nature peremptory, given with respect to any excess of overages and not distinguishing as to the personal knowledge and intent of the individual defendants on such question.

28. The Court erred giving the instruction starting at page 5357 to the effect that the price to Shotwell included both the invoice amount and the over-ceiling amount.

29. The Court erred in giving the instruction at page 5361 that the violation of the OPA laws might be considered to show intent to violate the tax laws.

30. The Court erred in its instructions with respect to the disclosure and particularly in stating that such evidence (which had not been received with respect to the defendant Sullivan) might be considered as to the intent of the defendants, including Sullivan, to violate the income tax laws.

31. The Court erred in its instructions with respect to the so-called disclosure and its effect, particularly as it might affect the defendant Sullivan.

32. The Court erred in instructing the jury that the real question for them to decide was whether there was a willful intent by the defendants or any of them, allowing the jury to understand that the final question being posed to them by the Judge's charge could be resolved
653 against all or any one of the defendants if they found any one of the defendants to have the requisite willful intent.

33. The Court erred in giving the instruction with respect to any books, records or memoranda that may have been falsified in that the court merely advised the jury that they should then scrutinize the remainder carefully, instead of advising the jury that the remainder might be disregarded except as they might be corroborated by other credible evidence.

34. The Court's instruction with respect to what circumstantial evidence may be was in error so far as the defendant Sullivan was concerned because it would allow the jury to believe they might consider acts, declarations or circumstances that relate to others against Sullivan even though not admissible against Sullivan.

35. The Court erred in giving the instruction with respect to the importance of the case to the Government and the Government's great concern, etc.

36. The Court erred in the final summary of what it stated to be the "controlling issues" in that so far as the defendant Sullivan is concerned, the definition is far broader and includes facts far greater than those facts applicable to the case of the defendant Sullivan.

37. The Court erred in refusing to make corrections of his charge in the respects to which such corrections were requested by counsel, starting at page 5394 of the record.

654 38. The Court erred in failing to distinguish in any way the case so far as the defendant Sullivan is concerned from the case so far as the other defendants were concerned; and as long as the Court was undertaking to summarize what the evidence was, the failure to so summarize the difference as to the status of the proof was error as to Sullivan.

39. The Court erred in its summary of facts in that while it stressed what was said by Graflund about the memorandum of in-and-out money at the cash box, there was no mention made at all of the testimony with respect to the memorandum by Gladys Morrill; the one who actually kept it.

40. The Court erred in its summary of the evidence in that although the Court called attention to certain deficiences in the proof of the defense because of the absence of records or memoranda, there was no such calling attention to glaring deficiencies in the records relied upon by the Government, particularly the entire absence of records that could be called book records of the Lubben companies other than the proprietorship.

41. The verdict of the jury and the rapid voting of eight verdicts show that it was reached as a result of considering the evidence of all matters received as being applicable equally to all of the defendants, and that the jury did not separately and fully consider the limited evidence with respect to the defendant Sullivan and the verdict is not fair and proper; and as further grounds for a new trial, the defendant Sullivan hereby adopts 655 and repeats as fully as though set out herein all of those grounds numbered (one) through (34), both inclusive (and including sub-paragraphs through 79 of 34) set out in the Motion for a New Trial filed on behalf of the defendants, The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Byron A. Cain and Frank J. Huebner.

And the defendant Sullivan prays that, if need be, leave be given to amend this Motion upon the argument thereof.

MEMORANDUM ON ORDER DENYING MOTION OF DEFENDANT HAROLD E. SULLIVAN FOR A NEW TRIAL.

On December 7, 1953, defendant Harold E. Sullivan made a motion for a new trial which the Court, after a hearing, denied. An order of denial was entered as of that day. At the time the order denying the motion was made, the Court stated that he reserved the right to file a memorandum which would be made a part of the order. This memorandum is made in accordance with that reservation. A statement of the Court's views as to some of the matters urged in support of the motion may be helpful.

667 Counsel contends that the Court unduly restricted the cross-examination of David Lubben, the principal witness for the Government. It appears that Lubben was on the witness stand for some six and one-half days. The Court permitted a wide latitude in his cross-examination as to all relevant matters which were at issue herein. But, as to certain fields of cross-examination, it became apparent that the defendants were attempting to inject collateral and irrelevant matters into the record which could only becloud the issues which the jury would be required to determine. Moreover, in considering any limitation upon the cross-examination of Lubben, it should be remembered that all of the defendants, including Sullivan, admitted that Shotwell received substantial overceiling payments of money from Lubben. The important questions in so far as Lubben's testimony was concerned were the amount of the payments, their duration, and to whom and the circumstances under which they were made. In my opinion, all the defendants were accorded full opportunity to cross-examine Lubben as to all material issues, and counsel were permitted to explore relevant transaction which Lubben claimed he had had with these defendants and with any others, which may have had any tendency to bear upon his credibility or his motives with respect to the testimony which he gave at this trial.

Defendant Sullivan contends that the Court's instruction as to the presumption of innocence was incorrect. First, it may be observed that no exception was taken by him to the language which the Court used in so instructing the jury, and secondly, it seems clear that the belated criticism of the language is entirely devoid of any substance. Reference is also made to the portion of the charge in which the jury were instructed as to the admitted violation of the O.P.A. laws by each of the defendants and the consideration which the jury might accord 668 to that fact. In this respect, the jury were instructed as follows (pp. 5360-61, record):

"Those defendants are not charged with the violation of any OPA law, and an intent to violate the tax laws cannot be proven simply because there was an intent to violate the OPA law, or any other Federal law.

"The fact that the OPA laws were admittedly violated may be considered by you in so far as such circumstances may throw light upon the conduct of the parties, their failure to keep adequate books and records of the overpayments, and to explain or throw light upon their conduct in handling these transactions, and with reference to the question of intent or lack of intent to wilfully violate the tax laws.

"The fact that the OPA laws were admittedly violated may be considered by you in so far as such circumstances may throw light upon the conduct of the parties, their failure to keep adequate books and records of the overpayments, and to explain or throw light upon their conduct in handling these transactions, and with reference to the question of intent or lack of intent to wilfully violate the tax laws.

"The fact, if it be a fact, that the defendants, or some of them, committed offenses against the price control laws of the United States creates no presumption that such defendant or defendants committed the offenses here charged against him or them."

No exception was taken by defendant Sullivan to the language used by the Court in this instruction. However, his criticism now is directed to the statement by the Court that the jury might consider the O.P.A. violations with reference to the question of intent or lack of intent to wilfully violate the tax laws. It seems evident that the portion of the instructions referred to, however, could not be considered as prejudicial to this defendant. It was the position of all of the defendants at the trial that the reason the over-ceiling payments were not entered on Shotwell's books was due to the fact that they knew that they were violating the O.P.A. laws, and they all contended that the absence of such entries on Shotwell's books was not due to any attempt on their part to con-669 ceal the receipts from the Government as income of the corporation. That is, all of the defendants urged that they assumed that the over-ceiling payments made by Shotwell for raw materials would offset the receipts that Shotwell received from Lubben, and hence no tax was due the Government. Whether the O.P.A. violations and the manner in which they were handled on the books of the company or otherwise had any bearing upon the question of intent of these defendants to violate the tax laws was clearly within the province of the jury.

The motion for new trial stresses the summarization made by the Court in the instructions to the jury and although it is recognized that the Court's only purpose was to aid and assist the jury in arriving at a fair and just verdict, it is urged that the summarization nevertheless was incomplete as to the defendant Sullivan. Now, the Court realizes that Appellate Courts have on various occasions scrutinized carefully the trial court's attempt in its instructions in criminal cases to summarize the contentions of the parties. Undoubtedly, the Court must be scrupulously careful so that any summary of the evidence, or a statement of the positions of the parties, will be entirely impartial and devoid of any leaning one way or another which might influence the jury. However, a court's instructions to a jury should be something more than a mere statement of the abstract principles of law which are applicable to the issues involved. If juries are to decide cases intelligently they should have a clear understanding of the issues of fact which they are to decide, and this is particularly true in a long, protracted trial of some five weeks' duration. The Court's only purpose, therefore, in attempting to summarize the contentions of the parties was to crystallize and clarify the issues which the jury would be required to determine. It should be noted that the Court took pains to admonish 670 the jury that the Court had not attempted to cover every detail of the defendants' testimony or their contentions herein, and specifically instructed them that if the Court's summations did not coincide with the jury's recollection or understanding of the testimony, or their deductions therefrom, they were to disregard what the Court had stated and rely entirely and exclusively upon their own recollection. Defendant Sullivan urges, however, that the Court, in stating the contentions of the defendants, failed to indicate in sufficient detail Sullivan's position as distinguished from the other defendants. He also contends that the Court failed to indicate that some of the summarization did not apply to defendant Sullivan because the portion of the summarization was not based upon testimony which had been received as to defendant Sullivan. Specific reference is made to the statement in the Court's instructions with respect to the alleged payments by Lubben to Huebner, and Huebner's alleged statements to Lubben as to the division of the moneys that were paid to him from time to time. But, in this connection, it should be remembered that one of the issues before the jury was whether these payments constituted income to Shotwell or whether they were made for the benefit of the individual defendants. The question, therefore, as to whether such payments constituted income to Shotwell was an issue as to Sullivan as well as to the other defendants. This portion of the instruction was made with specific reference to that question, and was couched in the following language (p. 5759, Record):

> " * * * In determining the issues of this case you have a right to take into consideration the manner in which such transactions involving overages were entered on the books of the Lubben companies in so far as they were entered and you have a right to take into consideration any records kept by Shotwell and also the testimony regarding the suggested division of the overages which were paid, together with all other facts and circumstances which may throw any light as to whether or not those overages constituted income to Shotwell.

671 "I charge you that to the extent that you find from the evidence that any cash payments for overages were received by individual defendants for their own benefit, then to such extent such payments would constitute income to such individual defendants and did not constitute taxable income to the Shotwell Manufacturing Company."

During the trial as the occasion required, this Court, at the request of counsel for defendant Sullivan, repeatedly stated to the jury that certain testimony was not competent and not received as to defendant Sullivan, and no exception was taken to the Court's rulings upon such objections, nor as to the manner in which the Court informed the jury that they should consider such testimony as being incompetent and not received as to defendant Sullivan. The Court in its instructions to the jury used the following language (p. 5366, Record):

"Any statement or act of any of the defendants not in the presence of another defendant is not binding upon the absent defendants, even though one or more of the defendants were mentioned in the conversation, nor are such matters competent evidence against any other defendant not present. I have limited, you will observe, certain evidence during the trial, from time to time, as being competent only as to certain defendant or defendants, that is, by way of example, what Mr. Huebner, or Mr. Cain may have said or done in the absence of Mr. Sullivan would not be binding or competent as to Mr. Sullivan. Likewise, what Mr. Huebner may have said or done not in the presence of Cain would not be binding on Cain, and what Mr. Cain may have said in the absence of Huebner would not be binding on Huebner."

This Court has no reason to assume that the jury did not give full effect to this admonition when it considered the summarizations made by the Court in its instructions and when it considered the sufficiency of the evidence as to defendant Sullivan's guilt.

Defendant Sullivan in his motion for a new trial also refers to the alleged prejudice arising as to him by the receipt in evidence of Cain's testimony, which was given by Cain on the motion to suppress. The jury were in-672 formed at the time the testimony was received that the evidence was not admissible as to the defendant

Sullivan, and there is no reason to assume that any prejudice was created in the jurors' minds as to Sullivan by reason of the receipt of such evidence. When the motion to suppress was made before this Court, it was joined in by defendant Sullivan and made on his behalf as well as on the part of all the defendants. Cain's testimony on the motion to suppress was offered on behalf of all of the defendants, including Sullivan. And it should be noted that Cain's testimony at the hearing on the motion to suppress was substantially the same as that given at the trial. In any event, the testimony was admissible as to Cain and due precautions were taken to make it clear to the jury that the alleged admissions of Cain were not received as to defendant Sullivan.

Both Cain and Sullivan at the trial admitted certain over-ceiling payments to Shotwell by Lubben, but denied that they totaled the amount claimed. They both contended that all of the payments had been used to purchase raw corn and that no tax therefore was due the Government, and they denied any wilfull attempt to evade or defeat Shotwell's 1945 and 1946 taxes by filing or causing to be filed a false and fraudulent tax return for those years or either of them. Consequently, it should be emphasized that the position of the defendants at the trial with respect to their defense was substantially the same. Any attempt by the Court to make separate summaries for each defendant under the circumstances was not warranted and would have been more confusing than enlightening.

The Court is not unmindful that, in a protracted trial where there are several defendants, a jury has a substantial burden in keeping in mind the evidence which may have been admitted as to one defendant and not 673 received as to another defendant. The Court, however, gave to the jury in substance every instruction requested by defendant Sullivan and no request was made prior to the giving of the instructions that the Court should attempt to call to the jury's attention the various items of evidence which were not received as to defendant Sullivan. I am convinced that the verdict of guilty as to the defendant Sullivan was not due to the jury's inability to distinguish between evidence which was competent as to him and the evidence which was incompetent or inadmissible as to him. The instructions in this regard were as explicit as defendant Sullivan requested, and when it is remembered that essentially the defendants took the same position in meeting the Government's proof on the controlling issues, the Court's instructions were sufficiently complete. And it should be noted that the Court made it clear that the case of each defendant was to be decided separately and as to each count (p. 5385, Record):

> "I have already indicated that these counts constitute a separate and distinct charge against each defendant and that it is necessary that you consider each count of the indictment separately and that you consider the guilt or innocence of each defendant separately as to each count. In reality, it is just as though you were trying eight separate cases, because we have four defendants, and we have two counts as to each. You must take up and consider separately each of these cases as you find the evidence bears upon each of them. Your verdict, of course, must be unanimous as to each count and as to each defendant regarding whom you render a verdict."

When the Court stated that "You must take up and consider separately each of these cases as you find the evidence bears upon each of them", the jury must have understood that they could not consider any evidence which was not received as to any one of the defendants on trial.

That the Court made it clear to the jury that the burden rested upon the Government to prove the guilt of each of these defendants beyond a reasonable doubt seems too apparent for serious question. The Court's charge 674 is replete with admonishments to the jury as to the burden which rested upon the Government to establish the guilt of each defendant as the law requires. The mere fact that the Court commented upon defendant's contention as to the disposition, for instance, of the moneys received from Lubben, and told the jury that if all of these over-ceiling payments received from Lubben were paid out for raw materials, there could be no tax due the Government therefrom and the defendants must be found not guilty, could not be construed as an inference that the burden shifted in anyway to the defendants to prove their innocence.

The instruction as to circumstantial evidence was couched in language which was almost verbatim with that requested by the defendant Sullivan. And in applying that instruction to the guilt or innocence of defendant Sullivan, the jury must have understood that they could only consider the circumstantial evidence which was applicable to his case.

Defendant Sullivan did not request a severance until the Government had rested. There was no way that the Court could grant the motion at that time without palpable prejudice to the remaining defendants. Moreover, the defendant Sullivan was given access to substantially all of the evidence that the Government introduced at the trial through pre-trial procedure which was accorded to all of the defendants with unusual latitude. Lubben's deposition was taken, as well as the other principal witnesses who appeared for the Government. All the books and records that the Government introduced at the trial were made available to the defendants prior to the trial. There was therefore not the slightest element of surprise which appeared in the Government's proof, and when defendant Sullivan failed to make a timely motion for severance, his failure to so move was with full knowledge of the nature and character of the Government's proof.

675 Comment has not been made on every ground urged by defendant Sullivan for a new trial, but it is my considered judgment that this defendant had a fair trial by an impartial jury, that the competent evidence admissible as to him was sufficient for the jury to find beyond a reasonable doubt that he was guilty of the offenses charged in the indictment, and that any error or irregularities which may have occurred during the trial as to him did not affect his substantial rights and do not constitute grounds for the granting of a new trial.

Let this memorandum be made a part of the Court's order of December 7, 1953, denying defendant Sullivan's motion for a new trial. It is so ordered.

STATEMENT OF POINTS ON WHICH DEFENDANTS-APPELLANTS, THE SHOTWELL MANUFACTURING COMPANY, BYRON A. CAIN and FRANK J. HUEBNER INTEND TO RELY IN THEIR APPEAL TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

1. The Court erred in sustaining the plaintiff's demurrer to the defendants' motion as amended for the dismissal of the indictment and in denying said motion as amended.

2. The Court erred in denying the defendants' additional motion to dismiss the indictment.

3. The Court erred in denying the defendants' motion to amend and supplement Section 4 of the motion to dismiss.

4. The Court erred in denying the defendants' written motion as amended to suppress evidence.

5. The Court erred in making the findings of fact and in holding the propositions of law incident to its denial of the defendants' said motion to suppress evidence.

6. The Court erred in denying the motion of the defendants for a mistrial based upon Lubben's statement in the presence of the jury that "these payments were admitted last December," etc.

730 7. The Court erred in failing to grant defendants' motion for mistrial, filed September 27, 1953, based on a newspaper article prejudicial as a matter of law and shown to have been read by one of the jurors.

8. The Court erred in denying the motion of the defendants presented in writing to strike certain testimony given by the witnesses Lubben, Krasne, and Feldman.

9. The Court erred in admitting any part of the Cain testimony given at the disclosure hearing.

10. The Court erred in excluding certain portions of the testimony of Cain at the disclosure hearing which his attorney asked be read to the jury along with the portions which counsel for the Government asked be so read. (Record 3019-3055) The Court's statement for the record at Record 4745-47, the Court's memorandum at 4748-4756, and the defendants' exceptions at 4757-4758, are related to the same matter.

11. The Court erred in ruling that the supposed admissions by Cain at the disclosure hearing were admissible against the corporate defendant.

12. The Court erred in failing to grant the defendants' motion, made at Record 1812, to strike the testimony of Heitman as to payment of $10,000 in 1945. (Record 2983-87)

13. The Court erred in failing to admit in evidence the Cunningham affidavit, Defendants' Exhibit 53. (Record 4193)

14. The Court erred in denying the defendants' motion to strike Lubben's testimony as to a payment of $36,148.35. (Record 2988)

15. The Court erred in denying the twice made motions of said defendants that a judgment of acquittal be entered as to Count I of the indictment on the ground that the evidence adduced by the Government was insufficient to sustain a conviction, and in denying the further motion of the defendant corporation for judg-
731 ment of acquittal as to Count II of the indictment on the same ground.

16. The Court erred in unduly restricting the scope of defendants' cross-examination of the witness Lubben and of other witnesses, and the Court erred in rejecting certain evidence proffered by the defendants, and in denying offers of proof made on their behalf having to do with the following matters:

(a) The credibility of the witness.

(b) The motives of the witness.

(c) The verity of the books and records maintained by the witness or company or companies with which the witness was identified.

(d) The financial position and history of Lubben and his expenditures as bearing upon the question as to whether he retained for his own use cash withdrawn from his companies. (Record 1366 et seq.)

17. The Court erred in taking into consideration the evidence adduced before it on the motion to suppress, and in attempting to limit the defendants on the trial of the general issue to matters which in its judgment were consistent with its recollection of the evidence at the prior hearing. (Record 1079-1121-41)

18. The Court erred in unduly and improperly restricting the scope of the defendants' proof as to the voluntary disclosure policy of the Treasury Department, and as to action taken by them in attempted compliance therewith (Record 4158, et seq.), and in its ruling on Defendants' Exhibits 96, 97, and 98.

19. The Court erred in preventing the defendants from proving the disclosure policy and their compliance with the conditions thereof as part of the surrounding circumstances which they were entitled to establish for the purpose of explaining supposed admissions at the dis-
732 closure hearing, as to which the Court permitted the plaintiff to make proof, and as to which it permitted the plaintiff on cross-examination to utilize certain documents allegedly submitted by Busby subsequent to the making of their disclosure.

20. Under the circumstances, the Court erred in giving its instructions to the jury on the subject matter of disclosure, in that it thereby limited the jury's consideration of the entire subject matter to the issue of intent.

21. The Court erred in permitting the plaintiff to use in evidence or for purposes of direct examination or cross-examination, any of the documents supplied to the plaintiff after the disclosure made by and on behalf of the defendants to Agents of the Treasury Department, including among others Government's Exhibits 185 and 186.

22. Having erroneously limited the defendants' disclosure evidence and its consideration by the jury to the narrow issue of intent, and having permitted the plaintiff to avail itself of certain of the evidence at the prior disclosure hearing on the sole doctrine of testimonial admissions for the purpose of showing unreported taxable income as of the time of the alleged disclosure, the Court erred in permitting the plaintiff on cross-examination and otherwise to go into matters having to do with premium payments as distinguished from premium receipts, matter which was utterly irrelevant in so far as the determination of additional tax was concerned, and matter which had nothing to do with either the issue of intent or the supposed admission of unreported receipts. Under the law then in effect, and having in mind the defendants expressed willingness to pay upon receipt of a bill and the Treasury's position as expressed to them that there could be no deduction for payouts, 733 the plaintiff's examination of the witness Busby and Cain was immaterial, irrelevant and prejudicial insofar as it involved an inquiry into the subject of payouts, whether on the issue of intent or on the doctrine of admissions.

23. In charging the jury, the Court erred when it spoke of payments made as money due to Shotwell, thereby ignoring the point that as a matter of law mere proof of payment to officers of a company under the circumstances at bar, is insufficient to show that the payments constituted income to Shotwell, except to the extent and over the period during which moneys were deposited in the corporation's boxes. Also, and to the extent that there could as a matter of law be any issue of fact on the proof at bar, the Court by said charge foreclosed the issue of fact as to whether the payments were income to Shotwell.

24. The Court further erred in its charge to the jury in erroneously assuming that knowledge by an officer that payments were not recorded on the books was equivalent to knowledge or would support an inference of knowledge that they were not adequately dealt with on the income tax returns.

25. In its charge to the jury, the Court undertook to summarize the defendants' contentions, but in so doing completely omitted all reference to their contention that the initial transactions in the indictment period had to do with trade deals as to which there were no overages.

26. The Court erred in failing to give defendants' Instruction 22 in substance as it was suggested. At Record 5359, the Court interpolated into said instruction the statement "but payments to a corporation and received by it for goods sold by it on the so-called black market do constitute revenue for tax purposes." And the Court erroneously interpolated other matters in the giving of said instruction in such way as to dilute it beyond 734 the point of any real significance or adequacy.

27. The Court erred in failing to charge the jury that they must consider not only what overages were paid by Lubben, but what portion of those overages, on the basis of the Government's evidence, constituted income to Shotwell.

28. The Court also erred in failing to charge the jury, with respect to any balance of overages that might have existed over and above what was paid out for corn, that they must determine what portion, if any, of that balance constituted taxable income to Shotwell.

29. The Court erred in failing to charge the jury in substance as requested by defendants' suggested Instructions 45 and 47.

30. By the latter portion of its charge at Record 5386-5388, the Court, for all practical purposes, nullified its preceding instructions and purported to substitute an inadequate and over-simplified statement of the issues in a manner patently prejudicial to the defendants, which in no way could be avoided or cured by the mere interpolation of the words: "in light of these instructions,"—meaning the preceding instructions. In so doing, the Court erred and its action in this respect was tantamount to a direction to the jury to find the defendants guilty.

31. As shown by the record, the defendants complied with the provisions of Rule 30, having to do with the filing of written requests for instructions. The Court passed upon the requests as so made and informed counsel of its proposed action prior to the arguments to the jury. The substance, form and order of the Court's charge to the jury, however, was such as to make it impossible for the defendants fully to state their objections in the short time allowed before the retirement of the jury. The instructions were not given in the order in which requested; they were not given in the language re-735 quested; there were interpolations by the Court between instructions, and even within the context of individual instructions, in such manner as to change or affect the meaning of the instructions, and in such way as to make it difficult and even impossible to determine whether the instructions which were to be given, were in fact given. The Court attempted to summarize the issues, and to some extent, the evidence. The summaries were not complete, and sometimes inaccurate. The adverse effect was not avoided by the Court's statement that the jurors should rely on their own recollections where those were at variance. Some of the jurors may have had no recollections on the matters involved. The defendants submit that the procedure employed was contrary to the intent and spirit of Rule 30.

32. The Court erred in instructing the jury that the presumption of innocence only remains until such time as "the Government has established his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt", which instruction starts at Record 5316.

33. The Court erred in its summary by repeated reference to the arrangements as being made between the Shotwell Company and Lubben and by repeated reference to the moneys coming to Shotwell.

34. The Court erred in his summary to the jury of the factual matter, particularly at the final summary beginning at page 5354, where he attempted to summarize the whole position of the defendants, but that summary is incomplete.

35. The Court erred in its instruction with respect to the question of the money received in and paid out by the Shotwell Company in that said instruction does not place the burden of proof upon that issue upon the Government but could be understood by the jury to put the burden of proof upon that issue upon the defendant.

36. The Court erred in its instructions with respect to intent, and what proof would be sufficient to show 736 intent, such instructions allowing improper presumptions to be made and improper inferences to be made.

37. The Court erred in the instructions given, with respect to the instruction, in its nature peremptory, given with respect to any excess of overages and not distinguishing as to the personal knowledge and intent of the individual defendants on such question.

38. The Court erred in giving the instructions starting at page 5357 to the effect that the price to Shotwell included both the invoice amount and the overceiling amount.

39. The Court erred in giving the instruction at page 5361 that the violation of the OPA laws might be considered to show intent to violate the tax laws.

40. The Court erred in refusing to make corrections of its charge in respect of the matters objected to by the defendants.

41. The Court erred in admitting certain evidence adduced by the plaintiff over the objections of these defendants.

42. The Court erred in ruling that inquiry by the defendants as to Lubben's income tax statements was immaterial.

43. The Court erred in improperly curtailing the scope of the cross-examination of the plaintiff's witness Lubben.

44. The Court erred in denying defendants' motion to strike the testimony of the witnesses Krasne and Mammel.

45. The Court erred in improperly restricting the scope of the cross-examination of the witnesses Moran, Davidson, Heitman, and Feldman.

46. The Court erred in permitting the witness Ericson to testify to matters not within his knowledge (Record 2748), and in permitting him to testify to instructions given him by one of the three individual defendants without specifying which defendant and in spite of his testimony that he could not so testify. (Record 275, 2765, 737 2767)

47. The Court erred in permitting counsel for the Government to ask leading and suggestive questions and to assume facts in dispute in questioning the witness Ericson. (Record 2753, 2758, 2761)

48. The Court erred in excluding certain evidence tendered by defendants and in striking portions of the testimony of defendants' witnesses.

49. The Court erred in rejecting various offers of proof made on behalf of the defendants.

50. The Court erred permitting the plaintiff to cross-examine defendants' witnesses beyond the scope of the subject matter of their direct examination.

51. The Court erred in sustaining plaintiff's objections to questions propounded to witnesses for the defendants on their direct examination.

52. The Court erred in sustaining objections to questions to the witness Dunlap as to reasons of abandonment of the voluntary disclosure policy, and in sustaining objections to direct questions to the witness Dunlap regarding difficulties in administration of such policy, and in rejecting defendants' offer of proof through such witness regarding the same.

53. The Court erred in admitting testimony of witnesses as to the alleged acts and statements of persons, made out of the presence of Cain and Huebner and not under circumstances making same binding or admissible against them.

53. The Court erred in admitting testimony of witnesses on matters as to which objections were made by counsel for the defense.

54. The Court erred in sustaining objections to questions put by counsel for the defense on cross examination of the Government's witnesses.

55. The Court erred in refusing to admit docu-
738 mentary evidence tendered by the defense:

56. The Court erred (Record 4250-54, 4801) in sustaining objection to defense Exhibits 79, 80 and 81—documents produced by Penick & Ford showing many instances of procurement of corn in which no identifying notation was made on the contract with the elevator, and that, therefore, the instances of procurement by Shotwell might have exceeded those shown by the contracts produced had the underlying memoranda records been available, and in rejecting Defendants' Exhibit 99 (Record 4906).

57. The Court erred (Record 4371) in refusing to permit 1952 acquiescence by the Commissioner in the Sullenger decision to be read into the record.

58. The Court erred (Record 4272-73) in refusing to admit Code sections granting to other departments access to income tax returns.

59. The Court erred (Record 4479) in overruling the objection to Government Exhibits 185, and (Record 4483) Government Exhibit 186, and (Record 4474) the objection to piecemeal questioning of Cain regarding the disclosure and said exhibits.

60. The Court erred (Record 4832-33) in sustaining plaintiff's objection to defense Exhibits 100-101, as to companies regarding which there was no testimony that they had a quota arrangement with Shotwell. This ruling deprived the defendants of the opportunity to submit a base to the jury on the question of allocations which they were endeavoring to do so as to assume that of the total syrup purchased by them in 1945-1946, an amount equal to 80% of the total quantity purchased in 1941 was by allocation and that the excess was through the procurement of raw corn.

61. The Court erred in denying motion to strike Government Exhibit 185. (Record 4899)

739 62. The Court erred in overruling objection to Government Exhibit 186. (Record 4984)

63. The Court erred in overruling objection to Government Exhibits of the 189 series (Record 4987-88); similarly (Record 4999-5001) in overruling objection that said documents were not properly rebuttal evidence.

64. The verdict is contrary to the weight of the evidence.

65. The verdict is not supported by substantial evidence.

66. The Court erred in denying the motion for acquittal.

67. The Court erred in entering the judgments against these defendants, and each of them, on each count of the indictment.

68. The Court erred in denying the motion of these defendants for a new trial, in arrest of judgment, and for acquittal notwithstanding the verdict.

69. The Court erred in its rulings during the hearing on defendants' motion to suppress evidence in November of 1952, as follows:

(a) In restricting the scope of the direct examination of the witness Cain by holding that it was not concerned with an explanation as to why the defendants could not say to whom premium payments had been made. Independently, the Court erred in permitting the witness Cain to be interrogated on cross examination notwithstanding such ruling, and also because it was irrelevant and immaterial because of the Commissioner's ruling that no deductions could be made on that account.

(b) In excluding certain evidence tendered by the defendants.

(c) In admitting certain evidence tendered by the plaintiff.

740 (d) In permitting the plaintiff to cross examine the witness Cain on the subject matter as to whether at the time of the filing of the returns in question the witness considered that there was an attempt to defeat and evade the payment of taxes owed by Shotwell Manufacturing Company.

(e) In permitting the cross examination of the witness Cain on the subject as to whether the witness did or did not consider that in fact an additional tax was owing to the Government.

(f) In failing to grant the defendants' motion to strike the testimony of the witness Doe.

(g) In sustaining plaintiff's objection to certain cross examination of the witness Mammel.

(h) In overruling defendants' objections to testimony of plaintiff's witness Twohig concerning an examination of the tax returns of Lubben or any of his companies.

(i) In permitting the witness Holz to testify to the privilege or prerogative of a field agent over defendants' objection that the manual theretofore requested had not been made available.

(j) In denying the motion of the defendants' filed November 21, 1952, for the items therein mentioned in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), and (d).

STATEMENT OF POINTS ON WHICH DEFENDANT-APPELLANT, HAROLD E. SULLIVAN, INTENDS TO RELY ON HIS APPEAL TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

1. All of the points specified in the Statement of Points heretofore filed in the above-entitled cause by the defendants-appellants, The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, a corporation, Byron A. Cain, and Frank J. Huebner.

2. The Court erred in denying the defendant Sullivan's motion for acquittal made at the conclusion of the Government's case.

3. The Court erred in denying the defendant Sullivan's motions made at the close of the Government's case that Sullivan be permitted to rest his case, be granted a judgment of acquittal, or, in the alternative, be allowed a severance so as to go to the jury on the record as it then stood against the defendant Sullivan.

4. The Court erred in denying the defendant Sullivan's motion for acquittal made at the conclusion of all of the evidence.

744 livan.

6. The Court erred in admitting testimony of witnesses as to the alleged acts and statements of persons, made out of the presence of Sullivan and not under circumstances making same binding or admissible against defendant Sullivan.

7. The Court erred in sustaining objections to cross examination of counsel for the defense which cross examination sought to use the contents of documents marked "Defendant's Exhibits".

8. The defendant Sullivan was substantially prejudiced and deprived of a fair trial by reason of, amongst other things, the attorney for the Government arguing the case against all of the defendants by the use of evidence which was not admitted against the defendant Sullivan.

9. The defendant Sullivan was substantially prejudiced and deprived of a fair trial by reason of, amongst other things, the admission into evidence of material not competent or admissible against Sullivan and which material had a prejudicial effect against Sullivan not cured by any instruction and which material the Government knew would be used and would prejudice Sullivan.

10. The Court erred in restricting the defense in the proofs that were sought to be made with respect to the disclosure question.

11. The Court erred in its summarization of the positions of the Government and of the defendants, particularly as to the defendant Sullivan during its instructions to the jury.

12. In instructing the jury the Court erred in referring to a "conference with the defendants Cain, Sullivan and Huebner" at the Pennsylvania Hotel early in 1945, when there was no such conference; and this is particularly important in view of the question of the time when Sullivan first had any business conferences, or knowledge of business conferences with Lubben, as to overage 745 payments.

13. The Court erred in summarizing the Government's contention, and again in summarizing the defendant's contention, in leaving out all specification of the start of the "trade" deals, although such deals were unquestioned at least in the beginning and were important.

14. In instructing the jury the Court erred in the summary of the contentions of the defendant in that such summary was incomplete, inaccurate and in important respects overlooked matters relied upon by the defendant Sullivan.

15. The Court erred in his summary of the defendant's position particularly when the Court discussed with the jury the Cain admissions made orally and in writing, such errors consisting not only in the summary itself not stating fully the situation relating to such admissions orally and in writing, but further the jury would assume from the Court's including those matters in his general discussion of the position of the defendants that such matters were binding upon or admissible against or could be considered in connection with the defendant Sullivan, although such matters had expressly not been offered by the Government with respect to the defendant Sullivan and were not in any way competent or in the record as against him.

16. The Court erred in his summary to the jury of the factual matter, particularly at the final summary beginning at page 5354 where he attempted to summarize the whole position of the defendants but that summary is incomplete and is particularly objectionable so far as the defendant Sullivan is concerned.

17. The Court erred in referring (at page 5347) to simply the language of the statute, for that is misleading in that form, particularly as coupled with the language defining a "person", making reference to its officers and certain duties of officers, and the coupling 746 with the language of the aiding and abetting statute.

18. The Court erred in quoting verbatim the Aiding and Abetting Statute, as it did at Transcript 5348.

19. The Court erred in its instructions with respect to the disclosure and particularly in stating that such evidence (which had not been received with respect to the defendant Sullivan) might be considered as to the intent of the defendants, including Sullivan, to violate the income tax laws.

20. The Court erred in its instructions with respect to the so-called disclosure and its effect, particularly as it might affect the defendant Sullivan.

24. The Court erred in instructing the jury that the real question for them to decide was whether there was a willful intent by the defendants or any of them, allowing the jury to understand that the final question being posed to them by the Judge's charge could be resolved against all or any one of the defendants if they found any one of the defendants to have the requisite willful intent.

22. The Court erred in giving the instruction with respect to any books, records or memoranda that may have been falsified in that the Court merely advised the jury that they should then scrutinize the remainder carefully, instead of advising the jury that the remainder might be disregarded except as they might be corroborated by other credible evidence.

23. The Court's instruction with respect to what circumstantial evidence may be was in error so far as the defendant Sullivan was concerned because it would allow the jury to believe they might consider acts, declarations or circumstances that relate to others against Sullivan even though not admissible against Sullivan.

747 24. The Court erred in giving the instruction with respect to the importance of the case to the Government and the Government's great concern, etc.

25. The Court erred in the final summary of what it stated to be the "controlling issues" in that so far as the defendant Sullivan is concerned, the definition is far broader and includes facts far greater than those facts applicable to the case of the defendant Sullivan.

26. The Court erred in refusing to make corrections of its charge in the respects to which such corrections were requested by counsel, starting at page 5394 of the record.

27. The Court erred in failing to distinguish in any way the case so far as the defendant Sullivan is concerned from the case so far as the other defendants were concerned; and as long as the Court was undertaking to summarize what the evidence was, the failure to so summarize the difference as to the status of the proof was error as to Sullivan.

28. The Court erred in its summary of facts in that while it stressed what was said by Graflund about the memorandum of in-and-out money in the cash box, there was no mention made at all of the testimony with respect to the memorandum by Gladys Morrill, the one who actually kept it.

29. The Court erred in its summary of the evidence in that although the Court called attention to certain deficiencies in the proof of the defense because of the absence of records or memoranda, there was no such calling attention to glaring deficiencies in the records relied upon by the Government, particularly the entire absence of records that could be called book records of the Lubben companies other than the proprietorship.

30. The verdict of the jury and the rapid voting of eight verdicts show that it was reached as a result 748 of considering the evidence of all matters received as being applicable equally to all of the defendants, and that the jury did not separately and fully consider the limited evidence with respect to the defendant Sullivan, and the verdict is not fair and proper.

31. There is no evidence that the defendant Sullivan willfully and intentionally attempted to evade the payment of the income taxes of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company as charged in the indictment.

32. There was insufficient evidence to submit any of the issues to the jury with respect to the defendant Sullivan in that all of the evidence tending to prove that the defendant Sullivan willfully, knowingly and intentionally sought to defeat the payment of the income taxes of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, as charged in the indictment, is purely circumstantial and there are one or more reasonable hypotheses under the evidence which supports a reasonable inference that the defendant Sullivan did not willfully, knowingly and intentionally seek to evade the payment of the income taxes of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company even if the Government's proof is to be taken as true.

33. The evidence against the defendant Sullivan is as consistent with innocence as it is with guilt.

34. There is no substantial evidence even considering all the evidence in the light most favorable to the Government that the defendant Sullivan willfully, knowingly and intentionally sought to evade the payment of the income taxes of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company.

35. There is no evidence, circumstantial or direct, which tends to prove that the defendant Sullivan was an active and efficient actor or participant in the filing of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company's income tax return for the years 1945 and 1946, nor that he had any
749. knowledge of the circumstances surrounding the filing of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company's tax returns for said years.

36. There is not sufficient evidence to warrant conviction of the defendant Sullivan in that the Government has failed to prove facts sufficient to constitute a prima facie case, and further has failed to prove any criminal intent on the part of the defendant Sullivan.

37. The Court erred in admitting testimony of witnesses on matters as to which objections were made by counsel for the defense.

38. The Court erred in sustaining objections to questions put by counsel for the defense on cross examination of the Government's witnesses.

39. The Court erred in refusing to admit documentary evidence tendered by the defense.

40. The Court erred in instructing the jury that the presumption of innocence only remains until such time as "the Government has established his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt", which instruction starts at Transcript 5316.

41. The Court erred in its summary by repeated reference to the arrangements as being made between the Shotwell Company and Lubben and by repeated reference to the monies coming to Shotwell.

42. The Court erred in its instructions with respect to intent, and what proof would be sufficient to show intent, such instructions allowing improper presumptions to be made and improper inferences to be made.

43. The Court erred in its instruction with respect to the question of the money received in and paid out by the Shotwell Company in that said instruction does not place the burden of proof upon that issue upon the Government but could be understood by the jury to put the burden of proof upon that issue upon the defendant.

750 44. The Court erred in the instructions given, with respect to the instruction, in its nature peremptory, given with respect to any excess of overages and not distinguishing as to the personal knowledge and intent of the individual defendants on such question.

45. The Court erred giving the instruction starting at page 5357 to the effect that the price to Shotwell included both the invoice amount and the over-ceiling amount.

46. The Court erred in giving the instruction at page 5361 that the violation of the OPA laws might be considered to show intent to violate the tax laws.

47. The Court erred in its instructions at page 5347 in citing Section 145a, that being the misdemeanor statute, and the jury would believe that they could convict of a felony if the defendants had violated the misdemeanor section.

48. The Court erred in failing to grant the defendant Sullivan a new trial with appropriate provision for his severance.

49. The Court erred in entering judgment against the defendant Sullivan.

ORDER DENYING MOTION OF DEFENDANT HAROLD E. SULLIVAN TO CORRECT RECORD UNDER RULE 75h.

There has been presented to this Court a motion of Harold E. Sullivan wherein he seeks to correct the record in the above-entitled proceeding in the manner indicated in his motion. The motion is directed to the portion of the record reflecting certain remarks of the Court made on December 7, 1953, immediately prior to the sentencing of the defendant Sullivan, and after the Court had heard and denied his motion for a new trial.

When the transcript of the proceedings at the hearing was presented to this Court by the court reporter, several corrections were made therein because of palpable errors of the reporter in recording the proceedings. Among the corrections made in the record by the Court is the one defendant Sullivan refers to in his present mo-761 tion. The original transcript as submittted by the reporter contained the following statement of the Court (p. 5593):

> "In my opinion, even though the evidence may be comparatively speaking so much scantier or at least not as complete as it was with reference to Huebner and Cain, I think there was evidence in the record beyond a reasonable doubt to sustain the jury's verdict."

The Court corrected the above quoted portion so as to eliminate the words "so much" in the second line. The record was thereafter corrected by the court reporter accordingly. The defendant Sullivan seeks in his motion to have the record again corrected so as to leave in the words "so much", as reflected in the original transcript.

The correction referred to by the Court was made so as to correct an error in the record and to conform the record with the Court's recollection with what he had stated at the time. In any event, the record as corrected by the Court in the manner indicated correctly states and reflects the Court's characterization of the evidence as to the defendant Sullivan.

It follows, therefore, that defendant Sullivan's motion must be, and the same hereby is, denied. It is so ordered.

Dated this 6th day of February, 1954.

Gunnar H. Nordbye

762 And afterwards on, to wit, the 8th day of February, 1954 came the Defendant Harold E. Sullivan by his attorneys and filed in the Clerk's office of said Court his certain Motion To Correct Record Under Rule 75h in words and figures following, to wit:

MOTION OF DEFENDANT HAROLD E. SULLIVAN TO CORRECT RECORD UNDER RULE 75h.

Now comes the defendant Harold E. Sullivan and moves under Rule 75h of the Rules of Civil Procedure, applicable equally to criminal cases, to have the record at page 5593 corrected to truly disclose what occurred in the District Court and as grounds therefor shows:

1. At record 5593 the Court was addressing the defendant Sullivan, after the conclusion of the arguments for a new trial and the remarks permitted to the defendant Sullivan prior to sentencing. The record as originally written by the Court Reporter contains these two sentences on pages 5593 and 5594:

> "In my opinion, even though the evidence may be comparatively speaking so much scantier or at least not as complete as it was with reference to Huebner and Cain, I think there was evidence in the record beyond a reasonable doubt to sustain the jury's verdict. At least, as I have indicated in my order denying the motion for acquittal and after prolonged and protracted consideration, I have concluded that I should not disturb it and under those circumstances,

I have no other alternative but to impose sentence."

764 2. Sometime thereafter Roy E. Fuller, the official reporter, circulated to those who were getting the record certain revised pages with this notation:

"The attached pages have been revised as requested by Judge Nordbye."

3. In the revised pages 5593 and 5594 the quoted sentences now read as follows:

"In my opinion, even though the evidence may be comparatively speaking scantier or at least not as complete as it was with reference to Huebner and Cain, I think there was evidence in the record beyond a reasonable doubt to sustain the jury's verdict. At least, as I have indicated in my order denying the motion for acquittal and after prolonged and protracted consideration, I have concluded that I should not disturb it and under those circumstances, I have no other alternative but to impose sentence."

and the only change in the quoted sentences is to leave out the words "so much."

4. The quantum of proof with respect to the defendant Sullivan, and the Court's characterization of it, is material to the defendant Sullivan and he asks that the record be corrected so as to leave i. the words "so much" on page 5593 as they originally and accurately appeared in the record.

APPEALS FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORHERN DISTRICT OF ILLINOIS, EASTERN DIVISION

June 15, 1955

Before LINDLEY, SWAIM and SCHNACKENBERG, Circuit Judges.

SCHNACKENBERG, Circuit Judge.

Shotwell Manufacturing Company, a corporation (sometimes herein referred to as Shotwell) and Byron A. Cain, Frank J. Huebner and Harold E. Sullivan, its officers, were indicted on two counts on March 14, 1952, for allegedly wilfully and knowingly attempting to defeat and evade a large part of the income taxes due and owing by Shotwell to the United States of America for the calendar years 1945 and 1946, in violation of section 145 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code,[1] in that defendants filed and caused to be filed false and fraudulent tax returns for said corporation.

After trial on pleas of not guilty, the jury found all of the defendants guilty on both counts. Judgments of conviction were entered on the verdict, Shotwell was fined $10,000 on each count, the individual defendants were sentenced to three years' imprisonment on each count (to run concurrently), Cain was fined $5,000 on each count, Huebner was fined $5,000 on each count, and Sullivan was fined $2,500 on each count. The defendants have severally appealed.

The errors relied on arise out of the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict; the failure of the court to sustain defendants' motions to dismiss; the failure of the court to sustain motions to suppress documents and information prepared or furnished by defendants for the government during an alleged disclosure; certain rulings on evidence and instructions; and denial of motions for new trial.

1. The trial court was correct in denying the defendants' two motions to dismiss the indictment, in the nature of special pleas in bar. These motions were based on the theory that defendants had acquired immunity from criminal prosecution by making a "voluntary disclosure," in reliance upon an announced policy of the Treasury Department not to prosecute in cases where such a disclosure had been made.

There was no statutory basis for the alleged promises of immunity announced by the various Treasury Department officials.[2] Thus the making of a voluntary disclosure by the defendants was no legal bar to a criminal prosecution. Only an act of Congress could create such immunity. In the absence of statute, a defendant cannot enforce such a promise and "cannot by law plead such facts in bar of any indictment against him, nor avail himself of it upon his trial. * * *" Whiskey Cases, 99 U. S. 594, 595, 25 L. Ed. 399, 400.

Defendants contend, however, that there is a statutory basis for the voluntary disclosure policy in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise any civil or criminal case under § 3761 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939.[3] This same argument was squarely met and disposed of in U. S. v. Lustig, 163 F. 2d 85, 89,[3a] where the court said:

[1] 26 U. S. C. A. § 145 (b).

[2] "At the outset, it is most important to point out that this policy of the Bureau of Internal Revenue not to recommend criminal prosecution where the taxpayer had made a voluntary disclosure before the investigation started, had no basis either in statute, rule or regulation." Balter, Fraud Under Federal Tax Law, Second Ed. 1953, p. 102.

> "The compromise statute[4] affords no shield to one who has violated the tax laws unless there has actually been a compromise. See Botany Worsted Mills v. United States, 278 U. S. 282, 49 S. Ct. 129, 73 L. Ed. 379. It is not even claimed here that there was more than an offer to make a compromise. None of the formalities prescribed by the statute and treated by the Supreme Court as necessary to effect a compromise were observed. Botany Worsted Mills v. United States, supra, 278 U. S. at pages 288–289, 49 S. Ct. 129, 73 L. Ed. 379. There was no issue of fact for court or jury as to whether a contract of compromise had been made. Accordingly there is no merit in the defense of immunity."

The language of the Lustig opinion is fully applicable to the case at bar. The Treasury Department officials did not have the power to confer immunity on persons making voluntary disclosures, defendants' voluntary disclosure was not a statutory compromise of a criminal case and did not entitle them to immunity, and the motions to dismiss the indictment were properly denied.

2. A timely motion by defendants, supported by affidavits, and later amended, was made before trial to suppress certain evidence in the possession of the government. The motion averred that the evidence had been produced by defendants in reliance on a promise of immunity. More specifically, it averred that the Bureau of Internal Revenue, through the Secretary of the Treasury, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and other responsible treasury officials thereunto duly authorized, publicly offered and held out to all of those whose income tax returns contained omissions or misstatements, that there would be immunity from criminal prosecution in any case where the taxpayer who filed such return would come forward before investigation had been initiated and acknowledge the existence in such return of omissions for misstatements, and the Treasury Department in such case would merely assess such unpaid tax, interest, civil penalties, if any, as might thereafter be determined to be due, and that said offer was and had been in full force and effect. The motion likewise set forth that such timely acknowledgement was made to a responsible officer or agent of the Treasury Department in January 1948 of the returns of Shotwell for the years mentioned in the indictment; that the defendants informed said agents of the Treasury Department, among other things, that said returns contained omissions and misstatements in that they intentionally failed to include, under the heading of gross sales, all or part of the sums received by Shotwell through sales of goods, and they failed also to include under the heading of "costs of goods sold," various payments made by defendants for said goods, which receipts and payments were in excess of the ceiling prices [5] as set by the laws and regulations of the United States at the time such goods were purchased. It was also stated in the motion that the defendants at said times stated that Shotwell, through its officers, was ready, able and willing to pay such unpaid tax, interest and civil penalties, if any, as might be determined to be due after inspection and investigation by the agents of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The motion also set forth that, at the time of the disclosure, Shotwell's over-the-ceiling payments for raw material were not deductible as a part of the cost of goods sold, under the rulings of the Commissioner.

The motion also averred that the officers and agents of the Treasury Department acknowledged the sufficiency and timeliness of the disclosure, and that the defendants, at the request of said officers, caused to be made available to them the books and records of Shotwell, and the individual defendants communicated to them information in their possession materially related to said omissions and misstatements and not available to such officers and agents through said corporate books and records, which information could not have been obtained from the individual defendants in any manner in view of their constitutional privilege and rights, and also that the defendants caused certain accountants to be employed to assist the said agents in obtaining the facts. Shotwell thus incurred and paid auditing charges in excess of $20,000.

The motion also set forth in substance that in pursuance of the foregoing, the Treasury officials examined the corporate books, records and data, and made copies thereof continuously over a period of more than four years preceding the return of the indictment, and did not advise the defendants that said disclosure was untimely or insufficient, or that criminal prosecution was or had been contemplated, or that it might be recommended; that, notwithstanding the foregoing, said officials shortly before the proceedings before the grand jury which resulted in the indictment herein repudiated the said offer so relied and acted upon by the defendants, without granting to them any hearing or conference, and without communicating to them the amount which, upon such inspection, the Bureau of Internal Revenue had determined to be due, and without affording Shotwell or said officers on its behalf, an opportunity to pay such amount. The motion charged that the said actions of the Bureau of Internal Revenue constituted an improper inducement of a confession or admission of facts upon which a criminal prosecution might be based and an illegal search and seizure of the books, papers and records of the defendants, and that, in consequence, the admission in evidence of all books, records, papers and statements so obtained, and any copies thereof or data procured therefrom as a result of information obtained therefrom, would violate the rights of the defendants under the fourth and fifth amendments to the constitution of the United States.

A hearing was held on the motion to suppress. The following is a statement of the facts proved, including only those facts shown by the government's evidence wherever there was a conflict.

Leon J. Busby, a certified public accountant under the laws of Illinois, was a member of the firm of Busby and Oury, located in Chicago. Beginning in 1942 that firm did the general auditing work at Shotwell for the purpose of certifying financial statements used in credit channels. The firm prepared Shotwell's income tax returns, installed efficiency systems, and did other matters of a general accounting nature.

In January 1948, at the request of defendant Cain, Busby made a trip with Stanley Gratlund, vice-president and comptroller of Shotwell, to the plant of General Confections Company in New York, to determine whether a loan of $50,000 to General Confections, requested by David G. Lubben, would be financially secure. Having made a cursory survey, he reported to the Shotwell officers, including Gratlund and defendants Cain and Huebner, that the survey did not justify such a loan.

Although Busby was active in the supervision of the auditing work for Shotwell, he did not know that Shotwell had received over-ceiling or premium payments. During this trip Graflund told him of that condition. In reporting on January 11, 1948, to Cain and Sullivan, Busby recommended against making the load, and told of Graflund's revelation about the collection of over-ceiling prices for candy sold by Shotwell to General Confections, that Graflund had said that he did not know how much the over-ceiling payments were, and that he (Graflund) also thought "the money had been paid out by Shotwell." Busby said that he told Cain and Sullivan that, while it might not be that Shotwell was in a serious position, they should file an amended return to get the matter on record, and they discussed it for a while. Cain and Sullivan readily admitted the over-ceiling payments. They asked Busby "whether or not it would be in order to discuss the matter with the department." Busby told them that he thought it would and that, even if they made the disclosure, which was, in his opinion, the customary thing to do, "there probably would be nothing to it except that it would clear Shotwell of omissions from the tax returns." Busby directed their attention to the fact that it was a common thing to make disclosures to the department, and in so doing he did not see that there were any serious consequences, and that "there wouldn't be any critical attitude of the department towards them."

This discussion about making a disclosure occurred off and on between these men for a couple of weeks. They assigned Busby to communicate with the department, after having discussed the possibility of sending a lawyer.

About March 15, 1948, Busby went to the office of the Chief Deputy Collector in Chicago, Ernest Sauber, and told Sauber that he had a client which had been engaged in over-ceiling sales and over-ceiling purchases, which were not reflected in its books, that the client "wants to clean up some omissions from his tax return," that he [Busby] had been asked to prepare amended returns; that he had been unable to ascertain the exact figures and he did not know how he could prepare amended returns without having the figures, and he asked Sauber's advice on how to proceed. In response to Sauber's inquiry, Busby said that these transactions were handled all in cash, the part representing the over-ceiling payments was kept in a cash box, which cash was used to make over-ceiling purchases; that said transactions to a large extent "washed each other";

that when it was no longer necessary to make over-ceiling sales and purchases, the balance in the cash box was taken into the corporate records and declared as income for the year that the OPA ceiling ceased to exist. Busby told Sauber that "we wanted to go into the matter and have the agent come out and examine the situation and see what the real condition was and if there was any net amount due to the Government we wanted to pay it."

Sauber told Busby that he could not prepare amended returns on the basis of his then knowledge, and suggested that Busby get statements from every individual at Shotwell who had anything to do with these transactions, and therefrom reconstruct the figures necessary for an accurate return, and after the figures had been reconstructed to ask the internal revenue agent's office to audit the Shotwell return. On this occasion Sauber advised Busby that if the disclosure was timely and the facts that he had related to Sauber were correct, the latter policy of the Bureau should not be applied.

The next day Busby met Cain, Huebner and Sullivan and told them that Sauber recommended that one of the officers come forward and disclose the identity of the taxpayer and "that if this were done, they should proceed to determine as nearly as possible how much was involved, and he saw no reason why there should be any trouble with respect to criminal prosecution in case of timely disclosure." Sauber had said that either an officer of the company or its representative could make the disclosure. Busby also told the individual defendants that Sauber said that there was no need for amended returns. Cain, president of Shotwell, told Busby to go to the collector's office and "disclose the whole affair, the whole details."

On one of various visits of Busby to Sauber's office, Sauber asked if Busby knew how much was involved, and when given a negative answer and told that Shotwell had no specific records from which that could be determined, Sauber suggested that Busby gather "such information as we could from any memorandum or memory and summarize it on a form, and in the meanwhile he would contact the office of the agent in charge and have an auditor come out and work with us for the purpose of substantiating or getting together the true facts as nearly as could be accomplished." Sauber said that he would have the Agent in Charge, Mr. Wright, send out an agent to verify the summarization, or to help compile it. He said that the Agent "was to cover an examination of the books which would include just about a routine audit, verification of the tax returns; that he would examine the books and any other data that we had to submit to him."

Within a week Busby brought Cain into Sauber's office and said that Shotwell was the client that he had referred to in the previous meeting. Cain then told Sauber the same story that Busby had told him, and that "they did not know how to proceed in order to correct their tax returns." Sauber gave Cain the same advice he had given Busby, and told him "to ask for an audit of their returns."

Cain told Sauber that he had two boys in school and he was worried about publicity, and Sauber said that there would be no publicity on the case, that the only time an income tax case received publicity was when there was an indictment. Sauber told Cain that in his opinion this was strictly a civil case and that it was not a criminal case, and that he had nothing to worry about so far as publicity was concerned.

About thirty days thereafter (latter part of April 1948), Cain telephoned to Sauber and said that his advice had been followed, a meeting of all Shotwell people connected with the black market transactions had been held, and that figures had been prepared which he would like to come in and turn over to Sauber. The latter said that he had no jurisdiction in the case, that corporation returns were handled by the Revenue Agent's office, which he should call and request an audit of the Shotwell returns. At Cain's request, Sauber called the Revenue Agent's office. Ralph Johnson, the group chief in that office agreed to do it. Johnson said he would schedule the returns for audit. Sauber said the cases had not been assigned for audit to any particular agent.

Thirty days later and several times thereafter, Cain called Sauber and stated that no one had come from the department. He was very insistent that the audit be started. Sauber learned by inquiry at the Revenue Agent's office that there had been delays there due to misunderstanding in regard to the name of Shotwell. Sauber reported this fact to Cain.

From 1945 through 1948, the procedure in the office of the Collector of Internal Revenue in regard to corporate returns was that after returns were filed with the collector they were sent to the Bureau at Washington for statistical purposes and for clarification purposes. The Bureau would make a survey of the returns and select those which it believed were worthy of examination in the field. They were then sent to the office of the Internal Revenue Agent in Charge and there was a further classification made of those returns in the local office. Those returns which a local office believed required investigation were retained, sent to the record section where an office card record was made and then they would be sent to the various groups for investigation by their agents.

As to the Shotwell return for 1945, the card record fails to show on what date it was determined that the return should be audited or investigated. What the card does show, as interpreted by Holz, a government witness, is as follows: On January 15, 1947, the 1945 income tax return and the 1945 excess profits tax return of Shotwell were assigned to Group Chief Magnus for audit in the field, and Magnus assigned them to Agent Korman on January 20, 1947. Korman filed a report on August 5, 1947, and either then or later an agreement was signed consenting to the assessments of deficiencies such agreement specifying that the taxpayer waived his right to petition the tax court, and consenting to an immediate assessment of the deficiencies. This may have occurred at any time from August 8, 1947 to September 26, 1947, when the card record indicates that the case was disposed of.

As to the 1946 Shotwell return, the card record indicates that on December 11, 1947, the card was made out, and that on December 16, 1947, the return was assigned to Group Chief Granahan for investigation in the field by one of his agents, which means for an audit. On July 22, 1948, the card indicates the return was sent to Group Chief Johnson, and then on February 4, 1949, to Group Chief Williams, now deceased. The record is silent as to when any investigation or audit commenced as to the 1946 Shotwell return.

In 1949 Cain called Sauber and reported that three men had been auditing the Shotwell returns, and asked what could be done to expedite the closing of the case. Sauber referred him to Wright, Internal Revenue Agent in Charge. A week later Cain told Sauber that he had seen Wright and had "gotten nowhere" with him, and requested Sauber to find out what the difficulty was. After talking to Wright, Sauber advised Cain that the difficulty was Shotwell "would not tell the Government to whom the over-the-ceiling purchase payments had been paid, and until such time as the Shotwell Manufacturing Company would tell the Government or identify the persons receiving the over-the-ceiling purchase payments, the case would not be closed, that they would be required to cooperate with the Government before they would consider closing the case."

Cain then told Sauber "he could not identify the persons receiving these payments; the only persons that he knew of was a Dr. Doe in the Board of Trade Building, that someone had sent some money to, and that he himself thought it was a fictitious name and he would not appear ridiculous naming a Dr. Doe, and that was the only person he knew that had received any of these payments, and he would not reveal that name because he himself thought it was fictitious."

All corporate records were made available to revenue agents Krane and Mammel.

Revenue agent Krane came to work at the Shotwell plant in June or July 1948, and he came in from time to time over a long period of time. In July, 1948, Busby, having prepared a tentative schedule, gave it to the revenue agent when he appeared at the plant to examine the books.*

On February 7, 1949, revenue agent Mammel was given the Shotwell case. He had nothing to do with a decision as to whether there should be a recommendation of prosecution. The discretion in that regard was vested in the Intelligence Office, and he was not in that office. Although he could recommend a prosecution, those vested with authority could refuse to prosecute. In March of 1949, he talked to defendant Cain and told Cain that there might possibly be prosecution and therefore he (Mammel) had to do a perfect job in his investigation [of the accounts of Shotwell] so that he would not have to do the work over again. He did not tell Cain that he considered what they had done constituted a voluntary disclosure.

Early in 1951, Cain and Sullivan visited Wright and discussed the case in detail, at which time Cain stated that he wanted a bill. Wright again assured them "that he would check into it and see if a bill could be brought forth." Cain asked Wright if they "couldn't get the tax matter settled."

Prior to the indictment on March 14, 1952, the defendants were never notified what amount of tax the Bureau of Internal Revenue had determined was due.

On May 28, 1945, former Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau stated at a press conference that "some taxpayers who have failed to declare their full income and pay the tax due may escape criminal prosecution through voluntary disclosure of the deficiency only in cases where such voluntary disclosure is made before investigation is started."

On August 21, 1945, former Secretary of the Treasury Vinson stated through the press: "No one is going to jail for an honest mistake in filling out his tax return. Treasury policy even permits the wilful evader to escape prosecution if he repents in time. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue does not recommend criminal prosecution in the case of any taxpayer who makes a voluntary disclosure of omission or other misstatement in his tax return * * *. Monetary penalties may be imposed for delinquency, for negligence and for fraud, but the man who makes a disclosure before an investigation is under way protects himself and his family from the stigma of a felony conviction. And there is nothing complicated about going to a collector or other revenue officer and simply saying, 'There is something wrong with my return and I want to straighten it out.'"

On October 15, 1945, the then Commissioner of Internal Revenue "stressed the bureau policy of refraining from instituting criminal proceedings against taxpayers who come forward voluntarily and pay up delinquencies plus interest and civil penalties before the Bureau has begun investigating their cases."

On May 14, 1947, the chief counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue said in the course of an address: "The law requires the prosecution of the tax evader and that is what the Department recommends to the Attorney General. There is one important exception to that. * * * The Department has always encouraged voluntary disclosures. * * * The making of a voluntary disclosure is a simple thing. The taxpayer or his legal agent can go before any official of the Bureau of Internal Revenue or any of its field offices—whether it is the collector, a deputy collector, a revenue agent, a special agent, or any other responsible Treasury officer. There is no special form for making the disclosure. The simple statement that 'I have filed false tax returns and I want to make the government whole,' would constitute a complete disclosure. * * *"

The government's brief sets forth the following as the reasons the district court denied the motion to suppress:

The Treasury's voluntary disclosure policy required (1) the disclosure of a tax deficiency, (2) an admission that the taxes due had been wilfully evaded, and (3) good faith cooperation with the government thereafter in determining the amount of taxes due. The court made the following findings of fact: that appellants had never disclosed unreported income; that they had consistently denied any intent to evade taxes; that, far from showing good faith, they had attempted to deceive the revenue agents during the investigation; and that no government official had represented to appellants that their alleged disclosure would result in immunity from criminal prosecution.

In seeking to sustain the action of the district court in denying defendants' motion to suppress certain evidence, the government in its brief relies upon the reasons given by the district court, and adds that, "although the taxpayer who made a voluntary disclosure was not entitled to immunity from prosecution, an entirely different question would, of course, arise if the disclosure was made fully and fairly and in reliance on the policy, and if the action of the investigating agents gave the taxpayer good reason to believe that the Treasury would not recommend prosecution." The government contends that "that question has been determined adversely to appellants by the trial court's findings of fact, amply supported by the evidence summarized above, to the effect that the testimony at the suppression hearing indicated an entire absence of good faith on the part of appellants and no misleading actions or improper inducement on the part of the Government representatives."

It is obvious that both the district court and government counsel concede the existence of the Treasury Department's voluntary disclosure policy, and that the policy itself had valid legal standing. The differences of opinion here pertain to the application of the policy to this case.

(a) The evidence shows that defendants did disclose unreported taxable income. Their admission that they had omitted from Shotwell's return, over-the-ceiling receipts for candy sold, revealed income which should have been considered in fixing its tax, according to the Treasury Department's ruling that illegal payments for goods purchased were not deductible for tax purposes.

trary to the then legal contentions of the Treasury Department, they did disclose the facts. The voluntary disclosure policy referred to the disclosure of facts, and not to the disclosure of the legal contentions of a taxpayer's lawyer. Actually the legal contention made by the defendants at that time was not fantastic or unreasonable. This is established by the department's later reversal of its stand on such offsetting illegal disbursements, and its adoption of the same view that defendants suggested as to the law.[7] Therefore defendants' contention did not cast any doubt upon their good faith in making their disclosure of facts.

Nor was bad faith on their part evidenced by their conduct after making their offer of disclosure. They cooperated to the extent that they were able, and in complete compliance with the policy of the department. The insistence of the revenue agents that defendants go beyond their duty of disclosing facts material to the determination of their unreported tax liability, by informing the government of the names of the persons to whom they paid over-the-ceiling prices for raw materials, was met with a refusal by defendants. This refusal was not inconsistent with a full disclosure of relevant facts on their tax liability. First, in the various statements of the voluntary disclosure policy, there is no suggestion or requirement that a taxpayer must furnish information for the prosecution of others, except insofar as that information may be incidental to a determination of his own tax liability, and, secondly, in view of the government's position that payments by defendants of over-the-ceiling prices were not germane to the computation of defendants' tax liability, the identification of the persons receiving those payments was irrelevant. It can hardly be contended that a taxpayer, who comes in and admits that he incorrectly reported his income for tax purposes, can be required to become an informer against persons who may be criminally liable in transactions which are not pertinent to his tax liability.

We therefore hold that defendants' inability or refusal to name the recipients of Shotwell's illegal disbursements, did not show that their offer of disclosure was in bad faith.

(c) When confronted with defendants' admission that Shotwell had intentionally omitted taxable income from its 1945 and 1946 income tax returns, and an expressed willingness to pay what was due, and to cooperate with the Bureau of Internal Revenue in taking whatever steps were necessary to establish the amount thereof, the responsible heads of the Bureau in Chicago not only said nothing to indicate that the offer was rejected, but, in complete harmony with the policy of the Treasury Department in regard to voluntary disclosures, accepted the cooperation of the defendants and thereby obtained access to Shotwell's books and records, and conducted investigations which continued until an indictment was filed in the district court.

From March 1948, when defendants made their disclosure to Chief Deputy Collector Sauber, until March 14, 1952, when the indictment was filed, defendants were led to believe by the government representatives that the course which they were pursuing would avert their criminal prosecution. At the March 15, 1948, conference between Busby and Sauber, when the nature of the income omissions was frankly outlined by Busby, Sauber said that, if the disclosure was timely and the related facts were correct, he saw no reason why the immunity from criminal prosecution policy of the Bureau should not be applied. Later Sauber told Cain, who was worried about publicity, that there would be no publicity in this case, that the only time an income tax case received publicity was when there was an indictment. He expressed the opinion that this was strictly a civil case, and not a criminal case, and that Cain had nothing to worry about so far as publicity was concerned. This statement is corroborative of defendants' contention that immunity from such prosecution had been offered in return for a voluntary disclosure under the department's policy.

Early in 1951, Agent in Charge Wright told the defendants, who repeated prior requests that they be given a bill for their taxes so they could pay it, that he would check into the matter and see if a bill could be brought forth. As late as October 1951, Wright's assistant, Oscar Olson, told Cain that he had nothing to worry about at all.

These expressions from the representatives of the government, paralleling the Treasury Department's policy not to "recommend criminal prosecution in the case of any taxpayer who makes a voluntary disclosure of omission or other misstatement in his tax return," conclusively show that responsible government officials, from cabinet level to local level, had represented to defendants that their disclosure would result in immunity from criminal prosecution.

The government does not effectively support its contentions when it says that "As early as February 1949, Cain was told by the examining agents that prosecution was possible." This is because first, Mammel, who is the agent who made such a statement, had no authority to decide who should be prosecuted and, secondly, if this were to be an announcement of intention by the government to prosecute the defendants, it came almost a year after the disclosure had been made by the defendants and accepted by the revenue officials, and long after the government, by means of the disclosure, had obtained information and records which it used in the prosecution of this case.

(d) The government seems to contend in this court that when the defendants made their disclosure they should have used words indicating that they had perpetrated a fraud upon the government or, as otherwise expressed, that they had wilful intent to evade taxes. Their disclosure showed that they knew they had over-ceiling income, and that they had intentionally not reported it. That was all that was necessary. Nothing in the pronouncement of the policy required them, in making a disclosure, to use the language of a lawyer in characterizing their failure to report taxable income.

The application of the disclosure policy is not conditioned upon the officers of the corporate taxpayer exhibiting to the representatives of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a contrite spirit. It is not required by the policy that they appear in sackcloth and ashes and seek absolution from the internal revenue agent, or that he occupy the office of father confessor. When the taxpayer's representatives avail themselves of this policy they are not seeking moral forgiveness. The transaction is entirely amoral, one side seeking to avoid the criminal penalties which they have risked by their incomplete or erroneous return of income, and the government agents being engaged in the mundane purpose of collecting federal taxes.

We hold that as against this attack of the government, the disclosure by defendants was not defective.

(e) In a footnote in its brief in this court, the government makes an oblique attack upon the timeliness of defendant's disclosure. We think the facts in evidence show that when the disclosure was made, no investigation involving the over-ceiling income of Shotwell during the taxable years had been started or even suggested or contemplated by the government. The disclosure was timely.

When the revenue agents get the scent and are in pursuit of the miscreant, it is too late for him to seek the protection of the Treasury Department's voluntary disclosure policy. Until then its door is open and the welcome mat is out.

(f) There is no inconsistency between the voluntary disclosure and the statement by Cain that the defendants would contest an assessment when made. That is the right of any taxpayer who would question the method of determining his tax assessment. By making a disclosure of facts upon which an assessment can be made, a taxpayer is not deprived of his right to be heard on the method used in making the assessment.

We hold that defendants made a valid voluntary disclosure in reliance upon promises of immunity. The evidence thereby obtained by the government stands on the same footing as an oral or a written confession induced by such a promise. The use of such evidence at the trial was a violation of each defendant's privilege against being compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, as guaranteed by the fifth amendment to the constitution of the United States.

It therefore follows that the court erred in denying the motion, as amended, to suppress such evidence. The use of that evidence at the trial makes it necessary to reverse the conviction of the defendants.

In view of the fact that a retrial will be required in this case, we find it unnecessary to rule on defendant Sullivan's contention that the district court erred in overruling his motion for a separate trial made at the close of the government's case-in-chief. Upon his retrial he is free to make a timely motion for severance. We express no opinion as to what the ruling thereon should be.

Inasmuch as important and substantial evidence should have been suppressed, the case must be retried. It is unnecessary to express an opinion as to whether the remaining evidence upon the trial below did or did not establish defendant's guilt, or to pass upon the other errors relied upon.

For the reasons hereinbefore set forth, the judgments of the district court are reversed, with instructions to sustain defendant's motion as amended to suppress evidence, and to retry the case.

REVERSED AND REMANDED WITH INSTRUCTIONS.

LINDLEY, Circuit Judge, Dissenting.

I regret that I cannot agree with the result reached in the majority opinion.

Disregarding the merits of the suppression question for the moment, it seems to me the majority fails to define clearly its interpretation of the Bureau's voluntary disclosure policy. The legal issue involved on this phase of the case seems to me to require an explicit determination of just what that policy is, whereas the language of the majority, I think, leaves the resolution of that question in doubt.

As to the merits of the order denying suppression, in the first place, I believe that the majority has overlooked the nature of the issues raised by the motion to suppress. These include the legal question of interpretation of the Government's voluntary disclosure pronouncements and, in addition, the question of fact as to whether defendants made a voluntary disclosure within the purview of the announced policy. And if these two issues should be resolved in defendant's favor, a further question then arises, in the light of the reported cases, of whether evidence given to the Treasury officials in reliance on the disclosure policy will be suppressed. That question is by no means settled. Compare Centracchio v. Garrity, 198 F. 2d 382, 388, cert. denied, 344 U. S. 866 (CA 1), with In re Liebster, 91 F. Supp. 814.

Reverting to the legal question of interpretation of the policy statements, it seems to me the majority opinion turns on an assumption that any action by a taxpayer which advises a Treasury official that a tax return previously filed by him is incorrect or incomplete, is a sufficient disclosure. Paraphrasing the language in part, the majority opinion seems to hold that any word which is sufficient to put the Treasury bloodhounds on the scent of a fraudulent return is a sufficient disclosure, irrespective of what facts are revealed to or concealed thereby from the government and irrespective of what roadblocks the taxpayer may thereafter erect in the way of a determination of the true facts surrounding the fraudulent return. Then, as I construe the majority's expressions, any evidence that the taxpayer may thereafter surrender to treasury agents must be suppressed, if criminal prosecution is recommended when the fraudulent omission is discovered.

Such a broad statement of the doctrine, I think, is an unwarranted interpretation of the Treasury policy. The Wen-chel statement, upon which defendants place principal reliance, when considered in its entirety, carries with it the clear implication that the disclosure contemplated must be a full disclosure of all facts bearing on the false return. Secretary Snyder's statement, issued about 10 days after the Wenchel statement, after referring to the long existent policy, concluded that the application of the policy to a particular taxpayer "presumes, of course, that the repentant taxpayer cooperates with agents of the Bureau in determining the true tax liability."

Furthermore, I think the broad interpretation on which the majority opinion rests ignores persuasive judicial pronouncements bearing on this question. The Court of Appeals for the First Circuit in the Centracchio case, supra, said at 198 F. 2d at page 389: "If it be assumed * * * that evidence disclosed to the Treasury officials on the faith of the announced voluntary disclosure policy, and in compliance with its conditions, should be excluded from evidence in a subsequent criminal trial, it would seem that the taxpayer would have to satisfy the court that he made a voluntary, good faith disclosure of all data necessary to a correct computation of his income tax deficiencies, and that he made such disclosures, before an investigation was under way." And in In re Monroe, 110 F. Supp. 507, aff'd 215 F. 2d 81, cert. denied 348 U. S. 914 (CA–5), the court defined the disclosure policy as containing the specification that the disclosure must be "a complete, fair and honest disclosure, and not a portion." While these authorities are not binding on us, the reasonable interpretation adopted by the jurists who penned those opinions is entitled to our respect and deserving of our serious consideration. See also Chieftain Pontiac Corp. v. Julian, 209 F. 2d 657 (CA–1).

The question, basically, is what would the average taxpayer understand, after reading the Treasury statements, as to what would constitute a sufficient disclosure thereunder. The trial court, consistently with the pronouncements made in Centracchio and Monroe, applied the rule of reason that a "disclosure" requires a good faith disclosure of all facts pertinent to the fraudulent return. This, I believe, is a correct analysis of the policy as announced and, insofar as the majority opinion is based on a less restrictive rule, I respectfully dissent.

The second point on which I believe the majority falls into error is in its treatment of the suppression question as one wholly of law. It seems to me that the majority attempts to try the factual issues de novo and fails to give the requisite weight to the trial court's findings of fact which are essential elements of the question under review.

The weight to be accorded by a court of appeals to such findings has been variously defined. In Roberson v. United States, 165 F. 2d 752, at 754 (CA–6), the court pointed out that "the finding of the trial court on a preliminary question of fact should not be reversed on appeal if it be fairly supported by the evidence." In Nichols v. United States, 176 F. 2d 431 (CA–8), the court said at page 432: "The facts as determined by the trial court are supported by evidence * * * and are binding on this Court." And in Cannon v. United States, 166 F. 2d 85 (CA–5), the court's language was, at pages 86–87: "It cannot be said that the judge's findings on this question were without substantial support. Therefore we will not disturb those findings."

In each of these cases, the findings to which reference was had were made by the trial court in ruling on a motion to suppress evidence allegedly obtained by an illegal search and seizure. While these decisions, as well as the subsequently adopted rule which embodies the then existing case law,* pertain only to the classic search and seizure question rather than to the Treasury's voluntary disclosure doctrine, the proceeding to suppress the evidence is the same and the same procedural rules should be applied. If adequate evidence supports the findings upon which the trial court's ruling is based, we cannot disturb those findings. See White v. United States, 194 F. 2d 215, 217, cert. denied, 343 U. S. 930.

In its memorandum decision denying defendants' motion, the district court found that defendants had not sustained the burden of proving that a sufficient voluntary disclosure within the purview of the announced policy had been made by them. It found that there had been "no disclosure of an intentional violation or * * * of an intent to defraud the Government" in view of defendants' position, which they maintained at all times, that no tax liability could arise from Shotwell's failure to report black-market receipts, since such receipts and corresponding black-market disbursements by the company "washed-out" each other, and that the disclosure to Sauber was merely an admission of omissions in Shotwell's 1945 and 1946 returns which were based on defendants' alleged good-faith belief that no added tax liability arose from the company's black-market operations.

As bearing on defendants' proof as to their good faith in the so-called disclosure the court found that such records of the cash transactions in the black-market operations as the corporation had, had been destroyed on instructions of Cain prior to the initial conferences between Shotwell's agents and Sauber; that no bona fide efforts were made by defendants to reconstruct such destroyed records so as to enable the government to determine the amount of tax due, and that figures contained in work sheets turned over to Treasury agents as a part of the alleged disclosure were admittedly fictitious. The court found further that no promise of immunity had been held out to defendants by any representative of the government at any time, and that nothing was done by any agent of the Bureau to lead defendants to believe that the alleged disclosure was accepted as adequate or that there would be no criminal prosecution on account thereof.

Unless we can say that these findings are so lacking in evidentiary support as to require that they be set aside, we have no choice but to affirm the order denying the motion to suppress evidence. A brief recital of the facts underlying this litigation and a brief summary of the evidence before the court at the proceeding on the suppression motion sufficiently demonstrate, in my opinion, that the findings of the court, were amply supported.

When Busby, and later Cain, first approached Sauber, each reported that during the taxable years 1945 and 1946, Shotwell had sold large quantities of candy to Lubben, or to Lubben's companies, at a premium price above the established OPA ceiling for the commodity. These shipments were invoiced to the buyer at the established ceiling price, and payments therefor at those prices were recorded on Shotwell's books and duly reported on its tax returns. The buyer was billed separately for the above-ceiling portions of the purchase prices. These payments were received by defendants in cash and were neither recorded on the company's books nor reported for income tax purposes. At the same time, it was reported that the cash thus received was paid out by Shotwell as above-ceiling premium prices for the raw materials which it needed, such as corn syrup and chocolate. On the basis of the representations thus made, Sauber, at that time, expressed his opinion that the facts disclosed strictly a civil matter. The indictments were returned after several years of investigation, during which time Shotwell employed Busby, an accountant, to work with the federal agents.

But the above facts tell only a part of the story on which the trial court's findings are based. The evidence adduced at the suppression hearing indicates that Shotwell's black-market operations were more extensive than those first disclosed to Sauber. For example, Sauber was not advised that Shotwell, during the taxable period, made other black market sales of goods on which no part of the transaction was reflected on the company's books. Allusion has previously been made to other evidentiary facts bearing on the sufficiency of the alleged disclosure, namely, the fact that all records which reflected black-market operations were destroyed by defendants before they approached the Treasury officials and the fact that work papers and supposed summaries of the unreported income turned over to the agents were admittedly fictitious. Furthermore, defendants have maintained at all times that alleged black-market disbursements totalling hundreds of thousands of dollars were paid out by them, without the benefit of any receipts, to faceless men who were unknown to defendants. At all times during the investigation they refused to advise Treasury agents as to who had received these disbursements. They took the position that to whom such payments were made was none of the Bureau's business, while at the same time fictitious figures were inserted in accounting data given to the agents which purportedly reconstructed the financial history of Shotwell's black-market dealings.

The point to be stressed is that on the record before us we cannot say that the evidence does not support the finding of the trial court that no sufficient disclosure was made. We cannot say that the court's conclusion that "False statements and fraudulent representations made to Government agents under the pretense of a voluntary disclosure can never constitute the basis for immunity from criminal prosecution under any possible interpretation of the so-called voluntary disclosure doctrine" is an erroneous legal statement or that the hypothecated facts included in this statement are not descriptive of the proofs made in this case. Two factual questions were presented to the court below, namely, what was disclosed, and, was the disclosure prompted by the taxpayer's reliance on the announced policy or by some other motive best known to him? The trial tribunal has found that, at most, only a partial disclosure was made; that good-faith cooperation with Treasury agents was lacking, and that such lack of good faith disclosed a purpose to mislead the agents. These findings are adequately supported by the evidence. It is not within our province to second-guess the trial court on factual questions.

In my opinion we cannot overturn the court's further finding that no promise of immunity was held out to defendants or that no other representations were made, which reasonably led them to believe that no criminal prosecution was contemplated. Sauber's opinion, which he expressed during his initial meeting with Cain, that this was strictly a civil matter, was based on the latter's original statement that black-market income not reported for the taxable years was "washed-out" by black-market expenditures which was, as the court below found, a partial disclosure only of the true facts of the case. The oral testimony as to statements made at various times by Treasury agents that no prosecution was intended,—that defendants had nothing to worry about,—are disputed by the agents' testimony. Thus this finding is based, in large measure, on the trial court's ruling on the credibility of witnesses.

On the record as a whole, I cannot escape the conviction that the court's interpretation of the voluntary disclosure statements as requiring such a complete disclosure and good-faith effort as to enable the internal revenue agents to assess the additional tax due is a correct interpretation of the offer held out to taxpayers in the Treasury policy statements. Believing that the court's findings of fact are unassailable, I would affirm the decision denying defendant's motion to suppress the evidence and proceed to consider the merits of the appeal.

PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT

The Solicitor General, on behalf of the United States, prays that a writ of certiorari issue to review the judgments of the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, entered in the above case on June 15, 1955.

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of Judge Nordbye[1] denying respondent's motion to suppress evidence (Appendix, infra, pp. 27–34) has not been reported. The majority and dissenting opinions of the Court of Appeals (Appendix, infra, pp. 35–69) are not yet reported.

JURISDICTION

The judgments of the Court of Appeals were entered on June 15, 1955 (Appendix, infra, pp. 69–72), and a petition for rehearing, filed within the period allowed by the Court of Appeals, was denied on August 18, 1955. On September 16, 1955, by order of Mr. Justice Reed, the time for filing a petition for certiorari on behalf of the United States was extended to and including October 17, 1955. The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U. S. C., Section 1254 (1).

QUESTION PRESENTED

The district court, after hearing, found that respondents' alleged "voluntary disclosure" of their unpaid taxes was lacking in good faith, was not complete, and "had only one purpose and that was to mislead and misinform the Government agents of the true facts." The Court of Appeals reversed, holding that respondents had made a valid voluntary disclosure and that the use at the trial of evidence obtained through such disclosure constituted a violation of the Fifth Amendment.

The question is whether the Court of Appeals erred (a) in misapplying the so-called "voluntary disclosure" policy of the Treasury Department to the circumstances of this case, and (b) in misapplying the standards governing review of the trial court's findings of fact.

STATEMENT

On March 14, 1952, a two-count indictment was filed in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois charging that respondent Shotwell Manufacturing Company, a corporation, and the three individual respondents as officers thereof, wilfully attempted to evade a large part of the corporation's income taxes for 1945 and 1946, respectively, by filing fraudulent corporate income tax returns.[2] (R. 5–7.) The amounts of net income and the taxes due thereon, as reported in the returns and as corrected, were alleged to be as follows:

	Reported		Corrected
	Income	Tax	Income	Tax
Count I (1945)	$561,064.42	$370,638.95	$738,210.65	$534,288.89
Count II (1946)	1,202,917.18	457,012.98	1,526,490.47	579,970.83

[2] Shotwell Manufacturing Company manufactured candy and marshmallows. Sullivan, who had been attorney for the firm, and Cain, a millionaire real estate man, reorganized the business in 1941 and acquired a controlling stock interest. Cain became president, and Sullivan was general counsel with a salary of $30,000 a year. (R. 747–748, 971, 1764–1772, 1791–1793, 2541–2542, 2568–2569, 2629–2630, 2634–2637, 2647–2650, 2660–2661.) Huebner, a long-time employee of the corporation, became vice-president and general superintendent in charge of operations. He owned less than 1% of the stock. (R. 748, 1707, 1772, 1791, 2542, 2637.)

The Government furnished a bill of particulars which alleged that the unreported income resulted from the failure of the corporation to record on its books premiums received on certain sales of merchandise over and above the recorded invoice price, and from its complete failure to record certain other sales. (R. 8–9.) After a trial lasting five weeks, the jury returned its verdict of guilty as charged after short deliberation. (R. 3000.) The corporation was fined $20,000. (R. 3012–3013, 3221.) Cain was sentenced to imprisonment for three years and fined $10,000. (R. 3015–3016, 3224.) Sullivan was sentenced to imprisonment for three years and fined $5,000. (R. 3075, 3256–3257.) Huebner was sentenced to imprisonment for three years and fined $2,000. (R. 3019, 3222.)

The so-called voluntary disclosure policy of the Treasury Department was publicly announced in 1945 and was withdrawn in January 1952. (R. 3125–3126, 3142.) The policy provided generally that in cases in which taxpayers made voluntary disclosures of intentional evasions before an investigation had been begun, the Treasury Department would assess the tax deficiency plus civil penalties, including the 50% fraud penalty, but would not refer the case to the Department of Justice for criminal prosecution. (R. 3136–3137.) In two of the most definitive pronouncements of Treasury Department officials on the subject it was stated that taxpayers must cut "square corners" with the Government (R. 3140), and that the voluntary disclosure policy assumed "that the repentant taxpayer cooperates with agents of the Bureau in determining the true tax liability" (R. 3141). These two statements, one by J. P. Wenchel, Chief Counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the other by Secretary of the Treasury Snyder, were issued in May 1947. (R. 3132, 3140.)

Early in 1948 respondents informed a Treasury official that the corporation had failed to report large black market currency receipts from sales of candy to one David Lubben, and in the summer of that year they submitted schedules purporting to show that the corporation had received approximately $380,000 in this manner during 1944, 1945 and 1946. None of these receipts had been recorded in the corporation's books or reported in its tax returns for those years. (R. 1844–1845, 1846.)

After the indictment had been returned respondents filed two motions to dismiss, alleging that they had made a voluntary disclosure and were entitled to immunity from prosecution. (R. 11–12, 31–32, 612–614.) Both motions were denied. (R. 90–99, 616–618.) Respondents also filed a motion to suppress all evidence obtained from them subsequent to the alleged disclosure on the ground that prosecutive use of evidence obtained through a promise of criminal immunity constitutes a violation of constitutional rights. (R. 120–127.) After a three day hearing at which both respondent Cain and Busby, the accountant who had advised the alleged disclosure and who had prepared the documents submitted in behalf of the corporation, testified at length, the motion was denied. (R. 150–448.) The evidence at the hearing was in sharp conflict on many points, and Judge Nordbye stated at the close that he felt it would be inappropriate to express his opinion as to the credibility of the witnesses and the good faith of respondents prior to trial, and he reserved the right to file findings of fact and conclusions of law upon completion of the trial. (R. 447–448.) After verdict Judge Nordbye filed a memorandum (Appendix, infra, pp. 27–34) in which he found as a fact that respondents' alleged disclosure was completely lacking in good faith and that they had been in no way misled by representatives of the Government.[3] Pointing out that the jury's verdict of guilty necessarily implied a finding that respondents, far from cooperating in a determination of the corporation's taxes, had intended to deceive the Government by the alleged disclosure, he said (Appendix, infra, p. 34):

[3] In view of this, Judge Nordbye found it unnecessary to determine whether the alleged disclosure had been made before the Government had begun an investigation of the corporation's returns. (Appendix, infra, p. 34.)

> What a travesty it would be if, under such circumstances, immunity should be granted to the defendants because of the alleged disclosure which had only one purpose and that was to mislead and to misinform the Government agents of the true facts. False statements and fraudulent representations made to Government agents under the pretense of a voluntary disclosure can never constitute the basis for immunity from criminal prosecution under any possible interpretation of the so-called voluntary disclosure doctrine.

The evidence to support Judge Nordbye's findings may be summarized as follows:[4]

During the period when David Lubben was paying cash premiums over and above the invoice price for merchandise received from the corporation, Cain and Sullivan had impressed upon him that they were not paying taxes on this income and that no records should be kept of the cash payments. (R. 860–863, 920–922.) Sometime in the early part of 1948, however, Cain discovered, to his surprise, that Lubben had recorded all his over-the-ceiling cash payments.[4] (R. 866.) Early in February Cain sent Hufebner to pick up these records in order to "check their records" against Lubben's (R. 867), but the latter, on advice of his attorney, Davidson, refused to surrender the originals until he had photostats made (R. 864–870, 1316–1321). About the same time, Cain sent Busby, the accountant, and Graflund, the corporation's comptroller, to Lubben's plant to examine his books in connection with a $50,000 loan Lubben had requested. Graflund had further instructions, "to pick up whatever papers might be helpful to the company, personal memoranda, or anything else that might be helpful," without Lubben's knowledge.[5] (R. 1757–1758, 1773.)

[4] Some of the following facts are taken from the record of the hearing on the motion to suppress; others are taken from the trial evidence. In passing upon the propriety of a ruling such as this, the reviewing court will consider the whole record, not merely that portion prior to the ruling. Carroll v. United States, 267 U. S. 132, 162; Rent v. United States, 209 F. 2d 893, 896 (C. A. 5th).

During this visit Busby first learned of the cash premiums.[6] (R. 168–170.) He promptly spoke to Cain and Sullivan, who told him that all the receipts had been spent for raw materials; that they had not kept records of either the receipts or the expenditures because they did not wish to reveal violations of O. P. A. regulations; and that they had not reported the receipts as income because they considered the corresponding expenditures deductible and the whole series of transactions a wash-out tax-wise. Busby told them that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue would not allow deductions for the over-the-ceiling expeditures, and, knowing of Chief Counsel Wenchel's statement on the voluntary disclosure policy, he advised that the matter be disclosed. (R. 170–175, 204–207, 209–211, 213–214, 225–227, 248.)

[5] Busby and Graflund placed this visit in January 1946. (R. 1757, 1825.) Lubben placed it in February. (R. 1207.)

[6] When Busby had prepared the corporation's returns for 1945 and 1946 he was given to understand that all receipts were recorded in the books and that there had been no violation of Office of Price Administration regulations. (R. 1822–1825.)

In a series of conferences beginning about March 15, 1948, Chief Deputy Collector Sauber was advised of the above explanations, and he was told by Cain that it would be extremely difficult to prepare amended returns because no records had been kept of the over-the-ceiling receipts and payments and because the payments for raw materials had been made to "faceless" men who were unknown to respondents. (R. 224–249, 265, 282–285, 291, 299, 2580.) Cain stated that the corporation would immediately pay any tax the Government claimed, but that it would probably at a later date contest the Commissioner's refusal to allow deductions for its over-the-ceiling expenditures. (R. 232, 252, 1948.) Since the statement made to him clearly indicated lack of wilful intent to evade the corporation's taxes (see R. 295), Sauber told Cain that it was "strictly a civil case" and that there would be no publicity. At no time did he assure Cain and Busby that they had made a valid voluntary disclosure. (R. 285–291.) He advised them that they should reconstruct both the receipts and the expeditures as accurately as they could and that an agent would then audit the corporation's books to determine the taxes due. (R. 282–285.)

Busby's subsequent exhaustive reconstruction, assisted by respondents and the staff of the corporation (R. 182–187, 232–233), resulted in a summary which revealed the receipt of approximately $380,000 in cash overages from Lubben for 1944, 1945 and 1946.[8] When it came to the countervailing expenditures, Cain testified that no one could recall the men (whom he characterized as "faceless") to whom these payments had been made (R. 208, 212, 223–224, 244, 249), so Cain quickly wrote down on a slip of paper a number of meaningless "plug" figures representing disbursements for raw materials,[9] and these were used by Busby to complete his summary (R. 216–217, 233–234, 258–268). The result was a credit balance of $6,000 which, according to respondents, had actually been reported in the corporation's return. (R. 131.) After Busby's work had been completed Cain notified Sauber that the figures were ready. (R. 285–286.) Cain testified that they represented "our best estimate at that time" (R. 261), and, when Revenue Agent Lima arrived at the corporation's office in the summer of 1948 to begin the audit, Busby gave him his work sheets and summary with the remark that they represented both the receipts and the disbursements "as near as they could figure" (R. 321). In February 1949 Cain was told by one of the investigating agents that criminal proceedings were possible. (R. 327–328, 331–332.) In the summer of 1949 Cain was told that the case would not be closed until respondents cooperated with the Government by revealing the persons to whom the corporation had made over-the-ceiling payments to obtain raw materials. (R. 240–241, 285–290.)

The corporation had kept an informal record of Lubben's over-the-ceiling cash payments. Some time after the revenue agents had come to the corporation's office in the summer of 1948, Cain twice directed Graflund to destroy this record, and his orders were eventually carried out.[10] (R. 785, 1743–1745.) In August 1948, and again in August 1951, Cain offered Lubben financial assistance and urged him to leave the country to avoid questioning by the agents. He admitted to Lubben that the corporation had received the overages, said that he was willing to pay the Government $450,000 personally just to get the matter cleared up, and indicated that he was attempting to settle the case through a political contact with Daniel Bolich, then Special Agent in Charge of the New York office of the Treasury Intelligence Unit. (R. 962–974, 1321–1328, 1335–1336, 1365, 2623.) The record reveals other efforts, both by Cain and by Sullivan, to have the case closed through political pressure. (R. 964, 972, 1322, 2680.)

At no time did respondents openly admit, either during the investigation or during the course of the proceedings in the courts below, that they had intentionally evaded corporate taxes. It is true that at the time of the alleged disclosure in 1948 they admitted that the corporation owed additional taxes, because at that time the Commissioner of Internal Revenue would not allow deductions for over-the-ceiling expenditures. (R. 171, 181, 207–208, 229–232.) However, that question was then pending before the courts. In December 1948 the Tax Court overruled the Commissioner and held such deductions allowable (Sullenger v. Commissioner, 11 T. C. 1076), and this was followed by a number of decisions to the same effect in the Courts of Appeals.[11] (R.

[11] The Commissioner acquiesced in these decisions shortly prior to the trial of this case. (R. 428.)

144–145, 427–428.) Accordingly, when respondents filed their pre-trial motions, they not only denied intent to evade the corporation's taxes, but they also denied that the corporation owed any additional taxes. (R. 17, 31–32.)

At the trial the Government proved by the direct evidence of Lubben and his associates and by Lubben's records that respondents had received approximately $450,000 in unrecorded and unreported cash premiums during 1945 and 1946 alone. (R. 1838–1840, 1844–1846, 2064–2066.) Although the summary submitted by respondents in connection with the alleged disclosure had showed receipt of about $380,000 in cash overages by the corporation from Lubben in 1944, 1945 and 1946 (supra, p. 11), and although at the disclosure hearing neither Cain nor Busby limited the receipts to any particular period (see R. 222–225), respondents Cain and Sullivan testified at the trial that the overage receipts from Lubben were confined to the period between September 1945 and August 1946, that they amounted to no more than $150,000, and that all of this had been paid out to unidentified individuals in premiums for raw materials. The defense was largely devoted to attempts to discredit Lubben and his records, and to efforts to prove that the corporation must have paid out large sums in overages during 1945 and 1946 in order to obtain the raw materials necessary to continue in operation.

Three employees of the corporation testified vaguely that they had made such payments (R. 1732, 1736, 1738, 1782, 1784, 1785, 2009–2014, 2017), but none of them could testify as to the amounts they had paid. None of the other numerous witnesses for the defense had knowledge of any specific amount paid out in the corporation's behalf. (R. 2038–2039, 2329, 2376, 2384, 2404, 2433, 2467, 2488, 2575, 2652, 2685.) And no witness was called to testify that he had received cash payments from the corporation.[12]

Without referring to a large part of the evidence summarized above, the Court of Appeals, with Judge Lindley dissenting, held, contrary to the district court's express findings, that respondents had "cooperated to the extent that they were able, and in complete compliance with the policy of the department." (Appendix, infra, p. 54.) The majority held that respondents had made a voluntary disclosure, and that the use at the trial of evidence obtained through the disclosure constituted a violation of the privilege against self-incrimination as guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment. The convictions were reversed with in-

[12] Respondent Huebner, to whom almost all of Lubben's cash payments were delivered personally and who was in charge of operation of the Shotwell plant, did not take the stand. When the sentences were about to be imposed Cain voluntarily asked the court to give consideration to the fact that all of Huebner's actions had been approved by himself and Sullivan. (R. 3013, 3016–3017.)

structions to grant the motion to suppress evidence. The majority found it unnecessary to consider numerous other alleged errors. (Appendix, infra, p. 59.)

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

The opinion of the majority below assumes that a taxpayer who has made a voluntary disclosure must in good faith cooperate with the revenue agents in a determination of his correct tax liability, in order to obtain the exclusion of evidence obtained from him if criminal proceedings are instituted. (Appendix, infra, pp. 54–55.) The majority holds that these respondents did cooperate. Judge Lindley points out in his dissent that it is uncertain whether the majority opinion means that, as a matter of law, a partial disclosure is sufficient to bring a taxpayer within the terms of the policy; or whether it means that, as a matter of fact, there was no substantial evidence in this record to support Judge Nordbye's finding, in effect endorsed by the jury, that respondents' disclosure was completely lacking in good faith. (Appendix, infra, pp. 60–63.) Whichever be taken as the basis of the decision of the court below, we submit that the decision is so manifestly erroneous as to call for review by this Court.

1. As Judge Lindley says in his dissent, the majority opinion seems to hold "that any action by a taxpayer which advises a Treasury official that a tax return previously filed by him is incorrect or incomplete * * * is a sufficient disclosure, irrespective of what facts are revealed to or concealed thereby from the government and irrespective of what roadblocks the taxpayer may thereafter erect in the way of a determination of the true facts surrounding the fraudulent return." (Appendix, infra, pp. 60–61.)

We agree that if a taxpayer should have voluntarily disclosed an unpaid tax liability before investigation has begun, and should thereafter cooperate in good faith in a determination of the taxes due, he would be entitled to an exclusion of the evidence thus obtained should criminal proceedings be instituted.[13] But in this case all respondents did was to present evidence of additional receipts from which it might possibly be concluded that the corporation owed additional taxes. They never admitted tax evasion, and they ultimately even denied that any taxes were owing. They filed no new, corrected tax returns. They destroyed crucial evidence. They presented fictitious evidence of corporate expenditures. They endeavored to persuade the Government's key witness to go to South America. They attempted to settle the case through political pressure. And they did not even disclose all the corporation's unreported cash receipts, for Busby's summary showed receipts of only about $380,000 in cash overages from Lubben for 1944, 1945 and 1946, whereas the Government proved approximately $450,000 for 1945 and 1946 alone. (Supra, p. 14.)

[13] It is highly doubtful that the exclusion of such evidence rests, as the majority below held (Appendix, infra, p. 59), upon the constitutional privilege against self-incrimination, since a voluntary disclosure does not involve extortion of a confession by either physical or moral compulsion. Holt v. United States, 218 U. S. 245, 252–253; Centracchio v. Garrity, 198 F. 2d 382, 388 (C. A. 1st), certiorari denied, 344 U. S. 866; cf. United States v. Carignan, 342 U. S. 36, 41. If this were the basis for the rule, there would be serious doubt of its applicability here, since the disclosure was made on behalf of a corporation which cannot claim the privilege. United States v. White, 322 U. S. 694, 699. We think confessions of this nature should be excluded under a rule of evidence. See Centracchio v. Garrity, supra; and cf. United States v. Carignan, supra, and McNabb v. United States, 318 U. S. 332.

Furthermore, there were two reasons why it was necessary for the agents to determine what respondents had done with these receipts. If they had not, as they claimed, paid them out for raw materials, then they would obviously have been intentionally evading corporate taxes, and the 50% fraud penalty (supra, pp. 3–4), a civil incident of the assessment and collection of the proper tax (Helvering v. Mitchell, 303 U. S. 391, 405) and a very considerable amount in this case, would automatically have become due to the Government. Secondly, although during most of 1948 the Commissioner was disallowing black-market expenditures as deductions, the question had not yet been decided by the courts, and the agents would have been remiss in their duties if they had failed to check the accuracy of the expenditures figures in Busby's summary. When the decision in Sullenger v. Commissioner, 11 T. C. 1076, overruled the Commissioner not long after the audit had begun (supra, p. 13), it became all the more necessary that the claim of deductible expenditures be thoroughly investigated in order to determine the proper amount of taxes owed by the corporation. Yet respondents consistently refused to produce any tangible evidence to support the claimed expenditures, and they have never specifically proved the payment of any money to the men they described as "faceless". Surely, to hold that in these circumstances, as a matter of law, respondents "cooperated to the extent that they were able, and in complete compliance with the policy of the department" (Appendix, infra, p. 54), transforms the "voluntary disclosure" policy into a device for enabling tax evaders to escape punishment, through the simple expedient of making "false statements and fraudulent representations" designed only "to mislead and to misinform the Government agents of the true facts" (Appendix, infra, p. 34).

This Court has held in the Whiskey Cases, 99 U. S. 594, that, where there is no statutory basis for a promise of immunity in return for a confession, the accused cannot hold the prosecutor to his promise; but that, if the accused fully and fairly complies with his part of the bargain, he obtains equitable rights which may be enforced. We submit that that principle should be controlling here, and that nothing less than full and fair cooperation with the agents in determination of the tax due constitutes sufficient compliance with the voluntary disclosure policy to justify exclusion of the Government's evidence. The decision of the majority, if it means that a partial disclosure is sufficient, is in conflict with the holdings in Contracchio v. Garrity, 198 F. 2d 382, 389 (C. A. 1st), certiorari denied, 344 U. S. 866, and Bateman v. United States, 212 F. 2d 61, 65–66 (C. A. 9th). And it conflicts in principle with the holding in Monroe v. United States, 215 F. 2d 81, 84 (C. A. 5th), certiorari denied, 348 U. S. 914, to the effect that an alleged disclosure cannot be twisted into a trap for the Government. Cf. Application of Henry Lustig Co., 67 F. Supp. 306, 310 (S. D. N. Y.), affirmed, 163 F. 2d 85 (C. A. 2d), certiorari denied, 332 U. S. 775.

The question of law involved is one of considerable importance to the revenue, for, although the policy has been abandoned, there are many pending cases in which this issue either has been, or can be raised.[14] Furthermore, the statute of limitations will not run on the last year affected by the policy until March 15, 1957, and it is likely that some cases involving the issue will reach the Courts of Appeals as late as 1960.

[14] We are informed by the Internal Revenue Service that there are now between 60 and 70 pending cases in which the question of a voluntary disclosure made under the former policy either has been, or may be, raised as a defense.

2. If, on the other hand, the majority means to hold that Judge Nordbye's finding of lack of good faith was without support in the record, the decision conflicts with numerous decisions of this Court and the courts of appeals, and constitutes such an extraordinary departure from the accepted and usual course of judicial proceedings as to call for the exercise of this Court's power of supervision. In view of the facts which we have set forth in the Statement (supra, pp. 8–15) there cannot be the shadow of a doubt that there was abundant evidence in the record to support Judge Nordbye's finding of "entire absence of good faith in * * * [the] alleged disclosure" (Appendix, infra, p. 31). True, the evidence was in conflict, but where the trial judge is required to make a finding of fact upon conflicting testimony the standard of review is the existence of substantial supporting evidence in the record. In United States v. Johnson, 327 U. S. 106, this Court reversed another split decision of the court below[15] on a similar issue, pointing out that the majority had substituted its own finding of fact for that of the trial court. This Court said (327 U. S., pp. 111–112, 113): "While the appellate court might intervene when the findings of fact are wholly unsupported by evidence, * * * it should never do so where it does not clearly appear that the findings are not supported by any evidence." See also United States v. Johnson, 319 U. S. 503, 518; Delaney v. United States, 263 U. S. 586, 589–590; Helvering v. Kehoe, 309 U. S. 277; White v. United States, 194 F. 2d 215, 217 (C. A. 5th), certiorari denied, 343 U. S. 930; Alger v. United States, 171 F. 2d 667, 668–669 (C. A. 7th); Cannon v. United States, 166 F. 2d 85, 86 (C. A. 5th); Lowrey v. United States, 161 F. 2d 30, 34 (C. A. 8th), certiorari denied, 331 U. S. 849; Blodgett v. United States, 161 F. 2d 47, 54–55 (C. A. 8th); United States v. Nardone, 127 F. 2d 521 (C. A. 2d); Coupe v. United States, 113 F. 2d 145, 148 (C. A. D. C.), certiorari denied, 310 U. S. 651.

The majority's substitution of its own finding of good faith in the disclosure is all the more inexplicable in view of the fact that the jury's verdict necessarily indicated that it had reached the same conclusion as had Judge Nordbye. For, while the Government proved that the corporation had received approximately $450,000 unreported income from Lubben, respondents testified that the amount was only $150,000 and that substantially all of this was passed along to the "faceless" men. If the jury had believed respondents, they would have been acquitted. Despite the verdict of guilt, however, the majority finds that the respondents "cooperated to the extent that they were able." (Appendix, infra, p. 54).

Judge Nordbye found that respondents had been in no way misled by representatives of the Government. (Appendix, infra, p. 33.) The majority substituted its own finding on this issue also. (Appendix, infra, pp. 55–57.) Sauber testified that he had never assured Cain and Busby that they had made a valid disclosure. (R. 291.) Early in 1949 an agent told Cain that prosecution was possible. (R. 327–328, 331–332.) In the summer of 1949 Cain was told by Sauber that the case would not be closed until respondents cooperated. (R. 289–290.) In October 1951 Agent Wright told him substantially the same thing. (R. 240–241.) Agent Olson flatly denied that he had assured Cain in October 1951 that he had nothing to worry about. (R. 357.) Judge Nordbye's finding is clearly supported by the record.

In conclusion, it should be noted that Judge Nordbye specifically refrained from making a finding as to the timeliness of the disclosure (Appendix, infra, p. 34), a question as to which the evidence was in conflict. The majority below made its own finding that the disclosure was timely. (Appendix, infra, p. 58.) The case should at least have been remanded to permit the court of first instance to pass upon this disputed issue of fact, if it were deemed significant.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated, it is respectfully submited that this case warrants further review. The petition for certiorari should be granted.

Respectfully submitted.

OCTOBER 1955.

In the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division

No. 52 Cr 143

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, PLAINTIFF

SHOTWELL MANUFACTURING COMPANY, BYRON A. CAIN, HAROLD E. SULLIVAN, FRANK J. HUEBNER, DEFENDANTS

MEMORANDUM DECISION

The above-named defendants filed a motion to suppress all evidence obtained from them by the agents of the Government subsequent to their alleged disclosure in January 1948, and the motion involves not only the suppression of any statements or admissions made by any of the defendants, but also all information and data obtained from the books, records, and documents belonging to the corporate defendant. The Court heard the evidence submitted by the defendants in support of their motion, and that offered by the Government in opposition thereto. At the close of the hearing on November 21, 1952, the Court announced that the motion would be denied and an order of denial was thereupon entered upon the minutes of the court. The Court reserved the right, however, to file a memorandum or formal findings of fact and conclusions of law in the event it later seemed necessary or advisable. The trial of the matter now having been concluded and the jury having found all of the defendants guilty on both counts of the indictment, the Court desires to set forth in a memorandum his views with reference to the motion to suppress.

It is the defendant's position that the use of any information divulged to the agents of the Government by the defendants or obtained by the agents of the Government from the books, records and documents belonging to the corporate defendant after their alleged voluntary disclosure, would be a violation of their rights under the Fourth and Fifth Amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

Defendants rely upon the former voluntary disclosure doctrine as enunciated in various public announcements of the officials of the Treasury Department and the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The so-called doctrine must be culled from the many statements, press releases and pronouncements of the officials in that no formal regulations or procedures in this regard were adopted by the Treasury Department or the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Reference to isolated statements made by various government officials as to what had to be done by a tax evader to obtain immunity in a tax prosecution may be entirely misleading. Considerable difficulty has been encountered in applying the so-called doctrine because of the many versions and interpretations which may be gleaned from press reports and public pronouncements attributed to various government officials charged with the enforcement of the income tax laws. And without attempting to formulate the doctrine in concise language from a reading of the various pronouncements referred to by the defendants and upon which they contend they relied in making their disclosure, it seems evident therefrom that at least the doctrine contemplated a situation where a taxpayer confesses his wilfull tax evasion to one or more of the designated government agents before any investigation is commenced by the Government and evidences his good faith by aiding and assisting the Government in obtaining the payment of the taxes due.

When Mr. Cain and Mr. Busby, the latter being the Shotwell Company's accountant, conferred with Mr. Sauber, the then Chief Deputy Collector for the First Internal Revenue District of Illinois, they merely indicated to him that there were unreported receipts obtained by the Shotwell Company in black market operations which were completely offset by unreported deductions for raw materials. And to the end that an amended tax return might be filed disclosing that situation, they sought the aid and advice of Mr. Sauber. Both Mr. Cain and Mr. Busby maintained to Mr. Sauber that the premium receipts were washed out, so to speak, by the premium payments made in connection with the goods that were sold and to the extent that there was any difference as between premium receipts and premium payments, such balance was reported in the 1946 corporation income tax return. There was no disclosure of an intentional tax violation or any disclosure of an intent to defraud the Government. Cain contended that he assumed in good faith that the premium receipts were offset by the premium payments made, and hence no taxes were due. Moreover, he contended that he did not know of any contrary ruling by the Treasury Department until Mr. Busby told him of such ruling. At most, therefore, the disclosure assumed to indicate nothing more than that there was a necessity of filing amended tax returns so that the corrected receipts and corrected payments for goods manufactured might be set forth therein and thus reconcile the items of net profits which had already been reflected in the net income for 1946. At no time during any of the alleged disclosure did the defendants disclose any unreported net income.

Defendants heretofore made a motion to dismiss the indictment on substantially the same grounds urged herein. This motion was heard by Judge Barnes and denied. In the affidavit in support of said motion submitted by Mr. Cain, it appears that he stated that he and his associates always maintained that the defendant corporation owed no tax over and above the amount reported in the 1945 and 1946 income tax statements. The claimed willingness of the defendants to pay any tax due the Government upon the assumption that the Commissioner's ruling regarding the nondeductibility of black market payments for raw materials required such tax payment, did not constitute an admission of a wilfull tax evasion. At most, according to the position of the defendants, the situation which was presented to Mr. Sauber was due to misunderstanding on their part resulting from their alleged good-faith belief that such payments were deductible and hence there were no additional taxes due the Government. Mr. Cain's gesture of accepting Mr. Lub-ben's figures of the total amount of overages paid to Shotwell and then fabricating fictitious payments for raw material to offset such receipts, indicates the entire absence of good faith in defendants' alleged disclosure. If they feared some civil assessment for a tax deficiency because the Treasury Department at that time had refused to recognize deductions for black market payments for the purchase of goods, nevertheless they indicated their reservation of the right to challenge such ruling. Consequently, it seems clear that here we have no disclosure of anything on which these defendants could be prosecuted. There was no admission of any tax fraud or any intent to violate the tax laws of the Government.

If the Government is to promise immunity, it must be in a situation where there is disclosed a wrongdoing on the part of the taxpayer, not merely a disclosure of good-faith errors in his return. Obviously, if the situation is one where there is no wrongdoing and no tax due the Government, there can be no dependency upon immunit under the so-called voluntary disclosure doctrine. If the defendants' alleged disclosure of the factual situation were true, there could be no criminal prosecution.

The very purpose of the voluntary disclosure doctrine was to obtain the payment of taxes of which the Government had been defrauded. The doctrine necessarily contemplates a contrite taxpayer who confesses his fraud and evidences good faith in aiding and assisting the Government in obtaining the payment of the taxes due. This basic element of a voluntary disclosure within the enunciated government policy is entirely lacking here. As indicative of the lack of good faith on the part of the defendants, the evidence discloses that some of the records which would be illuminating and helpful in determining the true situation with reference to defendants' black market operations were destroyed at the instance of Mr. Cain, and no bona fide attempt was made by any of the defendants to reconstruct destroyed or incomplete records in order to determine the amount and the persons to whom any premium payments were made for raw materials. The figures which were submitted to the Government agent in this regard were admittedly fictitious and submitted solely for the purpose of indicating that premium receipts were completely wiped out by the premium payments. In fact, the evidence indicates that Mr. Cain, during the various conferences with the Government agents, took the position that he would not under any circumstances disclose to whom any premium payments were made by Shotwell for raw materials, and thus he attempted to foreclose any investigation by the Government as to the verity of the claim of such payments.

The defendants urge that, under the so-called voluntary disclosure doctrine, the question of immunity does not rest in the discretion of the Government officials, but that there is an open promise of immunity by the Government in the event the taxpayer by his voluntary disclosure comes within the purview of the announced doctrine. But if that view is sound, defendants have, under the evidence submitted, fallen far short of presenting a factual basis for the application of the doctrine by the Court.

In addition, defendants urge that any disclosure made, written or otherwise, and the evidence obtained therefrom, must be suppressed because such disclosure was induced by a promise of immunity, express or implied, by the Government agents. I am convinced from the evidence produced on the motion that no promise of immunity was held out to these defendants, or any of them, by any representative of the Government when these alleged disclosures were made, or at any other time. Moreover, I am satisfied that there were no representations by any Government representative which would lead these defendants to believe that the alleged disclosure would be considered a voluntary disclosure within the purview of the voluntary disclosure doctrine. And the evidence will not sustain a finding that any Government representative held out to the defendants, or any of them, that there would be no criminal prosecution by reason of the so-called voluntary disclosure.

And, in passing, reference may be made to the results of the trial on the merits which took place in September and October, 1953, when the jury found, and the evidence convincingly established, that large sums of black market receipts received by the Shotwell Company were never paid out for raw materials on the black market or elsewhere during 1945 and 1946. The jury's verdict of guilty necessarily requires a finding that a substantial tax over and above that which was paid by the Shotwell Company for 1945 and 1946 was due the Government by reason of the unreported premium receipts received by Shotwell during 1945 and 1946. What a travesty it would be if, under such circumstances, immunity should be granted to the defendants because of the alleged disclosure which had only one purpose and that was to mislead and to misinform the Government agents of the true facts. False statements and fraudulent representations made to Government agents under the pretense of a voluntary disclosure can never constitute the basis for immunity from criminal prosecution under any possible interpretation of the so-called voluntary disclosure doctrine.

I find, therefore, that the defendants have failed to sustain the burden of proof in establishing that a voluntary disclosure was made by them within the purview of the so-called voluntary disclosure doctrine. In view of this finding, I do not find it necessary to make any finding as to the exact date when the Government first commenced its investigation of the Shotwell Company's income taxes for the years in question.

The above may be considered as the Court's findings of fact on defendants' motion to suppress, and the same may be and is hereby made a part of the order of this Court of November 21, 1952, denying defendants' motion to suppress.

An exception is reserved to the defendants.

APPEALS FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF ILLINOIS, EASTERN DIVISION

Before LINDLEY, SWAIM and SCHNACKENBERG, Circuit Judges.

SCHNACKENBERG, Circuit Judge.

Shotwell Manufacturing Company, a corporation (sometimes herein referred to as Shotwell) and Byron A. Cain, Frank J. Huebner and Harold E. Sullivan, its officers, were indicted on two counts on March 14, 1952, for allegedly wilfully and knowingly attempting to defeat and evade a large part of the income taxes due and owing by Shotwell to the United States of America for the calendar years 1945 and 1946, in violation of section 145 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code,[1] in that defendants filed and caused to be filed false and fraudulent tax returns for said corporation.

After trial on pleas of not guilty, the jury found all of the defendants guilty on both counts. Judgments of conviction were entered on the verdict, Shotwell was fined $10,000 on each count, the individual defendants were sentenced to three years' imprisonment on each count (to run concurrently), Cain was fined $5,000 on each count, Huebner was fined $5,000 on each count, and Sullivan was fined $2,500 on each count. The defendants have severally appealed.

The errors relied on arise out of the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict; the failure of the court to sustain defendants' motions to dismiss; the failure of the court to sustain motions to suppress documents and information prepared or furnished by defendants for the government during an alleged disclosure; certain rulings on evidence and instructions; and denial of motions for new trial.

1. The trial court was correct in denying defendants' two motions to dismiss the indictment, in the nature of special pleas in bar. These motions were based on the theory that defendants had acquired immunity from criminal prosecution by making a "voluntary disclosure", in reliance upon an announced policy of the Treasury Department not to prosecute in cases where such a disclosure had been made.

There was no statutory basis for the alleged promises of immunity announced by the various Treasury Department officials.[2] Thus the making of a voluntary disclosure by the defendants was no legal bar to a criminal prosecution. Only an act of Congress could create such immunity. In the absence of statute, a defendant cannot enforce such a promise and "cannot by law plead such facts in bar of any indictment against him, nor avail himself of it upon his trial, * * *" Whiskey Cases, 99 U. S. 594, 595, 25 L. Ed. 399, 400.

Defendants contend, however, that there is a statutory basis for the voluntary disclosure policy in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise any civil or criminal case under § 3761 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939[3] This same argument was squarely met and disposed of in U. S. v. Lustig, 163 F. 2d 85, 89[3a] where the court said:

> The compromise statute[4] affords no shield to one who has violated the tax laws unless there has actually been a compromise. See Botany Worsted Mills v. United States, 278 U. S. 282, 49 S. Ct. 129, 73 L. Ed. 379. It is not even claimed here that there was more than an offer to make a compromise. None of the formalities prescribed by the statute and treated by the Supreme Court as necessary to effect a compromise were observed. Botany Worsted Mills v. United States, supra, 278 U. S. at pages 288–289, 49 S. Ct. 129, 73 L. Ed. 379. There was no issue of fact for court or jury as to whether a contract of compromise had been made. Accordingly there is no merit in the defense of immunity.

The language of the Lustig opinion is fully applicable to the case at bar. The Treasury Department officials did not have the power to confer immunity on persons making voluntary disclosures, defendants' voluntary disclosure was not a statutory compromise of a criminal case and did not entitle them to immunity, and the motions to dismiss the indictment were properly denied.

2. A timely motion by defendants, supported by affidavits, and later amended, was made before trial to suppress certain evidence in the possession of the government. The motion averred that the evidence had been produced by defendants in reliance on a promise of immunity. More specifically, it averred that the Bureau of Internal Revenue, through the Secretary of the Treasury, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and other responsible treasury officials thereunto duly authorized, publicly offered and held out to all of those whose income tax returns contained omissions or misstatements, that there would be immunity from criminal prosecution in any case where the taxpayer who filed such return would come forward before investigation had been initiated and acknowledge the existence in such return of omissions for misstatements, and the Treasury Department in such case would merely assess such unpaid tax, interest, civil penalties, if any, as might thereafter be determined to be due, and that said offer was and had been in full force and effect. The motion likewise set forth that such timely acknowledgment was made to a responsible officer or agent of the Treasury Department in January 1948 of the returns of Shotwell for the years mentioned in the indictment; that the defendants informed said agents of the Treasury Department, among other things, that said returns contained omissions and misstatements in that they intentionally failed to include, under the heading of gross sales, all or part of the sums received by Shotwell through sales of goods, and they failed also to include under the heading of "costs of goods sold", various payments made by defendants for said goods, which receipts and payments were in excess of the ceiling prices [5] as set by the laws and regulations of the United States at the time such goods were purchased. It was also stated in the motion that the defendants at said times stated that Shotwell, through its officers, was ready, able and willing to pay such unpaid tax, interest and civil penalties, if any, as might be determined to be due after inspection and investigation by the agents of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The motion also set forth that, at the time of the disclosure, Shotwell's over-the-ceiling payments for raw material were not deductible as a part of the cost of goods sold, under the rulings of the Commissioner.

The motion also averred that the officers and agents of the Treasury Department acknowledged the sufficiency and timeliness of the disclosure, and that the defendants, at the request of said officers, caused to be made available to them the books and records of Shotwell, and the individual defendants communicated to them information in their possession materially related to said omissions and misstatements and not available to such officers and agents through said corporate books and records, which information could not have been obtained from the individual defendants in any manner in view of their constitutional privilege and rights, and also that the defendants caused certain accountants to be employed to assist the said agents in obtaining the facts. Shotwell thus incurred and paid auditing charges in excess of $20,000.

[5] Fixed pursuant to 50 U. S. C. A. App. § 902 (1944 ed.).

The motion also set forth in substance that in pursuance of the foregoing, the Treasury officials examined the corporate books, records and data, and made copies thereof continuously over a period of more than four years preceding the return of the indictment, and did not advise the defendants that said disclosure was untimely or insufficient, or that criminal prosecution was or had been contemplated, or that it might be recommended; that, not withstanding the foregoing, said officials shortly before the proceedings before the grand jury which resulted in the indictment herein, repudiated the said offer so relied and acted upon by the defendants, without granting to them any hearing or conference, and without communicating to them the amount which, upon such inspection, the Bureau of Internal Revenue had determined to be due, and without affording Shotwell or said officers on its behalf, an opportunity to pay such amount. The motion charged that the said actions of the Bureau of Internal Revenue constituted an improper inducement of a confession or admission of facts upon which a criminal prosecution might be based and an illegal search and seizure of the books, papers and records of the defendants, and that, in consequence, the admission in evidence of all books, records, papers and statements so obtained and any copies thereof or data procured therefrom as a result of information obtained therefrom, would violate the rights of the defendants under the fourth and fifth amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

A hearing was held on the motion to suppress. The following is a statement of the facts proved, including only those facts shown by the government's evidence wherever there was a conflict.

Leon J. Busby, a certified public accountant under the laws of Illinois, was a member of the firm of Busby and Oury, located in Chicago. Beginning in 1942 that firm did the general auditing work of Shotwell for the purpose of certifying financial statements used in credit channels. The firm prepared Shotwell's income tax returns, installed efficiency systems, and did other matters of a general accounting nature.

In January 1948, at the request of defendant Cain, Busby made a trip with Stanley Graflund, vice-president and comptroller of Shotwell, to the plant of General Confections Company in New York, to determine whether a loan of $50,000 to General Confections, requested by David G. Lubben, would be nancially secure. Having made a cursory survey, he reported to the Shotwell officers, including Graflund and defendants Cain and Huebner, that the survey did not justify such a loan.

Although Busby was active in the supervision of the auditing work for Shotwell, he did not know that Shotwell had received over-ceiling or premium payments. During this trip Graflund told him of that condition. In reporting on January 11, 1948 to Cain and Sullivan, Busby recommended against making the loan, and told of Graflund's revelation about the collection of over-ceiling prices for candy sold by Shotwell to General Confections, that Graflund had said that he did not know how much the over-ceiling payments were, and that he (Graflund) also thought "the money had been paid out by Shotwell."

Busby said that he told Cain and Sullivan that, while it might not be that Shotwell was in a serious position, they should file an amended return to get the matter on record, and they discussed it for a while. Cain and Sullivan readily admitted the over-ceiling payments. They asked Busby "whether or not it would be in order to discuss the matter with the department." Busby told them that he thought it would and that, even if they made the disclosure, which was, in his opinion, the customary thing to do, "there probably would be nothing to it except that it would clear Shotwell of omissions from the tax returns." Busby directed their attention to the fact that it was a common thing to make disclosures to the department, and in so doing he did not see that there were any serious consequences, and that "there wouldn't be any critical attitude of the department towards them."

This discussion about making a disclosure occurred off and on between these men for a couple of weeks. They assigned Busby to communicate with the department, after having discussed the possibility of sending a lawyer.

About March 15, 1948, Busby went to the office of the Chief Deputy Collector in Chicago, Ernest Sauber, and told Sauber that he had a client which had been engaged in over-ceiling sales and over-ceiling purchases, which were not reflected in its books, that the client "wants to clean up some omissions from his tax return", that he [Busby] had been asked to prepare amended returns; that he had been unable to ascertain the exact figures and he did not know how he could prepare amended returns without having the figures, and he asked Sauber's advice on how to proceed. In response to Sauber's inquiry, Busby said that these transactions were handled all in cash, the part representing the over-ceiling payments was kept in a cash box, which cash was used to make over-ceiling purchases; that said transactions to a large extent "washed each other"; that when it was no longer necessary to make over-ceiling sales and purchases, the balance in the cash box was taken into the corporate records and declared as income for the year that the OPA ceiling ceased to exist. Busby told Sauber that "we wanted to go into the matter and have the agent come out and examine the situation and see what the real condition was and if there was any net amount due to the Government, we wanted to pay it."

Sauber told Busby that he could not prepare amended returns on the basis of his then knowledge, and suggested that Busby get statements from every individual at Shotwell who had anything to do with these transactions, and therefrom reconstruct the figures necessary for an accurate return, and after the figures had been reconstructed to ask the internal revenue agent's office to audit the Shotwell return. On this occasion Sauber advised Busby that if the disclosure was timely and the facts that he had related to Sauber were correct, the latter saw no reason why the immunity from criminal prosecution policy of the Bureau should not be applied.

The next day Busby met Cain, Huebner and Sullivan and told them that Sauber recommended that one of the officers come forward and disclose the identity of the taxpayer and "that if this were done, they should proceed to determine as nearly as possible how much was involved, and he saw no reason why there should be any trouble with respect to criminal prosecution in case of timely disclosure." Sauber had said that either an officer of the company or its representative could make the disclosure. Busby also told the individual defendants that Sauber said that there was no need for amended returns. Cain, president of Shotwell, told Busby to go to the collector's office and "disclose the whole affair, the whole details."

On one of various visits of Busby to Sauber's office, Sauber asked if Busby knew how much was involved, and when given a negative answer and told that Shotwell had no specific records from which that could be determined, Sauber suggested that Busby gather "such information as we could from any memorandum or memory and summarize it on a form, and in the meanwhile he would contact the office of the agent in charge and have an auditor come out and work with us for the purpose of substantiating or getting together the true facts as nearly as could be accomplished." Sauber said that he would have the Agent in Charge, Mr. Wright, send out an agent to verify the summarization, or to help compile it. He said that the Agent "was to cover an examination of the books which would include just about a routine audit, verification of the tax returns; that he would examine the books and any other data that we had to submit to him."

Within a week Busby brought Cain into Sauber's office and said that Shotwell was the client that he had referred to in the previous meeting. Cain then told Sauber the same story that Busby had told him, and that "they did not know how to proceed in order to correct their tax returns." Sauber gave Cain the same advice he had given Busby, and told him "to ask for an audit of their returns."

Cain told Sauber that he had two boys in school and he was worried about publicity, and Sauber said that there would be no publicity on the case, that the only time an income tax case received publicity was when there was an indictment. Sauber told Cain that in his opinion this was strictly a civil case and that it was not a criminal case, and that he had nothing to worry about so far as publicity was concerned.

About thirty days thereafter (latter part of April, 1948), Cain telephoned to Sauber and said that his advice had been followed, a meeting of all Shotwell people connected with the black market transactions had been held, and that figures had been prepared which he would like to come in and turn over to Sauber. The latter said that he had no jurisdiction in the case, that corporation returns were handled by the Revenue Agent's office, which he should call and request an audit of the Shotwell returns. At Cain's request, Sauber called the Revenue Agent's office. Ralph Johnson, the group chief in that office, agreed to do it. Johnson said he would schedule the returns for audit. Sauber said the cases had not been assigned for audit to any particular agent.

Thirty days later and several times thereafter, Cain called Sauber and stated that no one had come from the department. He was very insistent that the audit be started. Sauber learned by inquiry at the Revenue Agent's office that there had been delays there due to misunderstanding in regard to the name of Shotwell. Sauber reported this fact to Cain.

From 1945 through 1948 the procedure in the office of the Collector of Internal Revenue in regard to corporate returns was that after returns were filed with the collector they were sent to the Bureau at Washington for statistical purposes and for clarification purposes. The Bureau would make a survey of the returns and select those which it believed were worthy of examination in the field. They were then sent to the office of the Internal Revenue Agent in Charge and there was a further classification made of those returns in the local office. Those returns which a local office believed required investigation were retained, sent to the record section where an office card record was made and then they would be sent to the various groups for investigation by their agents.

As to the Shotwell return for 1945, the card record fails to show on what date it was determined that the return should be audited or investigated. What the card does show, as interpreted by Holz, a government witness, is as follows: On January 15, 1947, the 1945 income tax return and the 1945 excess profits tax return of Shotwell, were assigned to Group Chief Magnus for audit in the field, and Magnus assigned them to Agent

Korman on January 20, 1947. Korman filed a report on August 5, 1947, and either then or later an agreement was signed consenting to the assessments of deficiencies, such agreement specifying that the taxpayer waived his right to petition the tax court, and consenting to an immediate assessment of the deficiencies. This may have occurred at any time from August 8, 1947 to September 26, 1947, when the card record indicates that the case was disposed of.

As to the 1946 Shotwell return, the card record indicates that on December 11, 1947, the card was made out, and that on December 16, 1947, the return was assigned to Group Chief Granahan for investigation in the field by one of his agents, which means for an audit. On July 22, 1948, the card indicates the return was sent to Group Chief Johnson, and then on February 4, 1949, to Group Chief Williams, now deceased. The record is silent as to when any investigation or audit commenced as to the 1946 Shotwell return.

In 1949 Cain called Sauber and reported that three men had been auditing the Shotwell returns, and asked what could be done to expedite the closing of the case. Sauber referred him to Wright, Internal Revenue Agent in Charge. A week later Cain told Sauber that he had seen Wright and had "gotten nowhere" with him, and requested Sauber to find out what the difficulty was. After talking to Wright, Sauber advised Cain that the difficulty was Shotwell "would not tell the Government to whom the over-the-ceiling purchase payments had been paid, and until such time as the Shotwell Manufacturing Company would tell the Government or identify the persons receiving the over-the-ceiling purchase payments, the case would not be closed, that they would be required to cooperate with the Government before they would consider closing the case."

Cain then told Sauber "he could not identify the persons receiving these payments; the only persons that he knew of was a Dr. Doe in the Board of Trade Building, that someone had sent some money to, and that he himself thought it was a fictitious name and he would not appear ridiculous naming a Dr. Doe, and that was the only person he knew that had received any of these payments, and he would not reveal that name because he himself thought it was fictitious."

All corporate records were made available to revenue agents Krane and Mammel.

Revenue agent Krane came to work at the Shotwell plant in June or July, 1948, and he came in from time to time over a long period of time. In July, 1948, Busby, having prepared a tentative schedule, gave it to the revenue agent when he appeared at the plant to examine the books.[6]

On February 7, 1949, revenue agent Mammel was given the Shotwell case. He had nothing to do with a decision as to whether there should be a recommendation of prosecution. The discretion in that regard was vested in the Intelligence Office, and he was not in that office. Although he could recommend a prosecution, those vested with authority could refuse to prosecute. In March of 1949, he talked to defendant Cain and told Cain that there might possibly be prosecution and therefore he (Mammel) had to do a perfect job in his investigation [of the accounts of Shotwell] so that he would not have to do the work over again. He did not tell Cain that he considered what they had done constituted a voluntary disclosure.

Early in 1951, Cain and Sullivan visited Wright and discussed the case in detail, at which time Cain stated that he wanted a bill. Wright again assured them "that he would check into it and see if a bill could be brought forth." Cain asked Wright if they "couldn't get the tax matter settled."

Prior to the indictment on March 14, 1952, the defendants were never notified what amount of tax the Bureau of Internal Revenue had determined was due.

On May 28, 1945, former Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau stated at a press conference that "some taxpayers who have failed to declare their full income and pay the tax due may escape criminal prosecution through voluntary disclosure of the deficiency only in cases where such voluntary disclosure is made before investigation is started."

On August 21, 1945, former Secretary of the Treasury Vinson stated through the press: "No one is going to jail for an honest mistake in filling out his tax return. Treasury policy even permits the wilful evader to escape prosecution if he repents in time. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue does not recommend criminal prosecution in the case of any taxpayer who makes a voluntary disclosure of omission or other misstatement in his tax return * * *. Monetary penalties may be imposed for delinquency, for negligence and for fraud, but the man who makes a disclosure before an investigation is under way protects himself and his family from the stigma of a felony conviction. And there is nothing complicated about going to a collector or other revenue officer and simply saying, 'There is something wrong with my return and I want to straighten it out.' "

On October 15, 1945, the then Commissioner of Internal Revenue "stressed the bureau policy of refraining from instituting criminal proceedings against taxpayers who come forward voluntarily and pay up delinquencies plus interest and civil penalities before the Bureau has begun investigating their cases."

On May 14, 1947 the chief counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue said in the course of an address: "The law requires the prosecution of the tax evader and that is what the Department recommends to the Attorney General. There is one important exception to that. * * * The Department has always encouraged voluntary disclosures. * * * The making of a voluntary disclosure is a simple thing. The taxpayer or his legal agent can go before any official of the Bureau of Internal Revenue or any of its field offices—whether it is the collector, a deputy collector, a revenue agent, a special agent, or any other responsible Treasury officer. There is no special form for making the disclosure. The simple statement that 'I have filed false tax returns and I want to make the government whole,' would constitute a complete disclosure. * * *"

The government's brief sets forth the following as the reasons the district court denied the motion to suppress:

The Treasury's voluntary disclosure policy required (1) the disclosure of a tax deficiency, (2) an admission that the taxes due had been wilfully evaded, and (3) good faith cooperation with the government thereafter in determining the amount of taxes due. The court made the following findings of fact: that appellants had never disclosed unreported income; that they had consistenly denied any intent to evade taxes; that, far from showing good faith, they had attempted to deceive the revenue agents during the investigation; and that no government official had represented to appellants that their alleged disclosure would result in immunity from criminal prosecution.

In seeking to sustain the action of the district court in denying defendants' motion to suppress certain evidence, the government in its brief relies upon the reasons given by the district court, and adds that, "although the taxpayer who made a voluntary disclosure was not entitled to immunity from prosecution, an entirely different question would, of course, arise if the disclosure was made fully and fairly and in reliance on the policy, and if the action of the investigating agents gave the taxpayer good reason to believe that the Treasury would not recommend prosecution." The government contends that "that question has been determined adversely to appellants by the trial court's findings of fact, amply supported by the evidence summarized above, to the effect that the testimony at the suppression hearing indicated an entire absence of good faith on the part of appellants and no misleading actions or improper inducement on the part of the Government representatives."

It is obvious that both the district court and government counsel concede the existence of the Treasury Department's voluntary disclosure policy, and that the policy itself had valid legal standing. The differences of opinion here pertain to the application of the policy to this case.

(a) The evidence shows that defendants did disclose unreported taxable income. Their admission that they had omitted from Shotwell's return, over-the-ceiling receipts for candy sold, revealed income which should have been considered in fixing its tax, according to the Treasury Department's ruling that illegal payments for goods purchased were not deductible for tax purposes.

(b) While they coupled a disclosure of unreported income with a legal suggestion that that income was not taxable because it was offset by disbursements substantially equivalent thereto for over-the-ceiling purchases of raw material, contrary to the then legal contentions of the Treasury Department, they did disclose the facts. The voluntary disclosure policy referred to the disclosure of facts, and not to the disclosure of the legal contentions of a taxpayer's lawyer. Actually the legal contention made by the defendants at that time was not fantastic or unreasonable. This is established by the department's later reversal of its stand on such offsetting illegal disbursements, and its adoption of the same view that defendants suggested as to the law.[7] Therefore defendants' contention did not cast any doubt upon their good faith in making their disclosure of facts.

Nor was bad faith on their part evidenced by their conduct after making their offer of disclosure. They cooperated to the extent that they were able, and in complete compliance with the policy of the department. They insistence of the revenue agents that defendants go beyond their duty of disclosing facts material to the determination of their unreported tax liability, by informing the government of the names of the persons to whom they paid over-the-ceiling prices for raw materials, was met with a refusal by defendants. This refusal was not inconsistent with a full disclosure of relevant facts on their tax liability. First, in the various statements of the voluntary disclosure policy, there is no suggestion or requirement that a taxpayer must furnish information for the prosecution of others, except insofar as that information may be incidental to a determination of his own tax liability, and, secondly, in view of the government's position that payments by defendants of over-the-ceiling prices were not germane to the computation of defendants' tax liability, the identification of the persons receiving those payments was irrelevant. It can hardly be contended that a taxpayer, who comes in and admits that he incorrectly reported his income for tax purposes, can be required to become an informer against persons who may be criminally liable in transactions which are not pertinent to his tax liability.

We therefore hold that defendants' inability or refusal to name the recipients of Shotwell's illegal disbursements, did not show that their offer of disclosure was in bad faith.

(c) When confronted with defendants' admission that Shotwell had intentionally omitted taxable income from its 1945 and 1946 income tax returns, and an expressed willingness to pay what was due, and to cooperate with the Bureau of Internal Revenue in taking whatever steps were necessary to establish the amount thereof, the responsible heads of the Bureau in Chicago not only said nothing to indicate that the offer was rejected, but, in complete harmony with the policy of the Treasury Department in regard to voluntary disclosures, accepted the cooperation of the defendants and thereby obtained access to Shotwell's books and records, and conducted investigations which continued until an indictment was filed in the district court.

From March, 1948, when defendants made their disclosure to Chief Deputy Collector Sauber, until March 14, 1952, when the indictment was filed, defendants were led to believe by the government representatives that the course which they were pursuing would avert their criminal prosecution. At the March 15, 1948, conference between Busby and Sauber, when the nature of the income omissions was frankly outlined by Busby, Sauber said that, if the disclosure was timely and the related facts were correct, he saw no reason why the immunity from criminal prosecution policy of the Bureau should not be applied. Later Sauber told Cain, who was worried about publicity, that there would be no publicity in this case, that the only time an income tax case received publicity was when there was an indictment. He expressed the opinion that this was strictly a civil case, and not a criminal case; and that Cain had nothing to worry about so far as publicity was concerned. This statement is corroborative of defendants' contention that immunity from such prosecution had been offered in return for a voluntary disclosure under the department's policy.

Early in 1951, Agent in Charge Wright told the defendants, who repeated prior requests that they be given a bill for their taxes so they could pay it, that he would check into the matter and see if a bill could be brought forth. As late as October, 1951, Wright's assistant, Oscar Olson, told Cain that he had nothing to worry about at all.

These expressions from the representatives of the government, paralleling the Treasury Department's policy not to "recommend criminal prosecution in the case of any taxpayer who makes a voluntary disclosure of omission or other misstatement in his tax return," conclusively show that responsible government officials, from cabinet level to local level, had represented to defendants that their disclosure would result in immunity from criminal prosecution.

The government does not effectively support its contentions when it says that "As early as February, 1949, Cain was told by the examining agents that prosecution was possible." This is because first, Mammel, who is the agent who made such a statement, had no authority to decide who should be prosecuted and, secondly, if this were to be an announcement of intention by the government to prosecute the defendants, it came almost a year after the disclosure had been made by the defendants and accepted by the revenue officials, and long after the government, by means of the disclosure, had obtained information and records which it used in the prosecution of this case.

(d) The government seems to contend in this court that when the defendants made their disclosure they should have used words indicating that they had perpetrated a fraud upon the government or, as otherwise expressed, that they had wilful intent to evade taxes. Their disclosure showed that they knew that they had over-ceiling income, and that they had intentionally not reported it. That was all that was necessary. Nothing in the pronouncement of the policy required them, in making a disclosure, to use the language of a lawyer in characterizing their failure to report taxable income.

The application of the disclosure policy is not conditioned upon the officers of the corporate taxpayer exhibiting to the representatives of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a contrite spirit. It is not required by the policy that they appear in sackcloth and ashes and seek absolution from the internal revenue agent, or that he occupy the office of father confessor. When the taxpayer's representatives avail themselves of this policy they are not seeking moral forgiveness. The transaction is entirely amoral, one side seeking to avoid the criminal penalties which they have risked by their incomplete or erroneous return of income, and the government agents being engaged in the mundane purpose of collecting federal taxes.

We hold that as against this attack of the government, the disclosure by defendants was not defective.

(e) In a footnote in its brief in this court, the government makes an oblique attack upon the timeliness of defendants' disclosure. We think the facts in evidence show that when the disclosure was made, no investigation involving the over-ceiling income of Shotwell during the taxable years had been started or even suggested or contemplated by the government. The disclosure was timely.

When the revenue agents get the scent and are in pursuit of the miscreant, it is too late for him to seek the protection of the Treasury Department's voluntary disclosure policy. Until then its door is open and the welcome mat is out.

(f) There is no inconsistency between the voluntary disclosure and the statement by Cain that the defendants would contest an assessment when made. That is the right of any taxpayer who would question the method of determining his tax assessment. By making a disclosure of facts upon which an assessment can be made, a taxpayer is not deprived of his right to be heard as to the method used in making the assessment.

We hold that defendants made a valid voluntary disclosure in reliance upon promises of immunity. The evidence thereby obtained by the government stands on the same footing as an oral or a written confession induced by such a promise. The use of such evidence at the trial was a violation of each defendant's privilege against being compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, as guaranteed by the fifth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

It therefore follows that the court erred in denying the motion, as amended, to suppress such evidence. The use of that evidence at the trial makes it necessary to reverse the conviction of the defendants.

In view of the fact that a retrial will be required in this case, we find it unnecessary to rule on defendant Sullivan's contention that the district court erred in overruling his motion for a separate trial made at the close of the government's case-in-chief. Upon his retrial he is free to make a timely motion for severance. We express no opinion as to what the ruling thereon should be.

Inasmuch as important and substantial evidence should have been suppressed, the case must be retried. It is unnecessary to express an opinion as to whether the remaining evidence upon the trial below did or did not establish defendants' guilt, or to pass upon the other errors relied upon.

For the reasons hereinbefore set forth, the judgments of the district court are reversed, with instructions to sustain defendants' motion as amended to suppress evidence, and to retry the case.

REVERSED AND REMANDED WITH INSTRUCTIONS.

LINDLEY, Circuit Judge, Dissenting.

I regret that I cannot agree with the result reached in the majority opinion.

Disregarding the merits of the suppression question for the moment, it seems to me the majority fails to define clearly its interpretation of the Bureau's voluntary disclosure policy. The legal issue involved on this phase of the case seems to me to require an explicit determination of just what that policy is, whereas the language of the majority, I think, leaves the resolution of that question in doubt.

As to the merits of the order denying suppression, in the first place, I believe that the majority has overlooked the nature of the issues raised by the motion to suppress. These include the legal question of interpretation of the Government's voluntary disclosure pronouncements and, in addition, the question of fact as to whether defendants made a voluntary disclosure within the purview of the announced policy. And if these two issues should be resolved in defendants' favor, a further question then arises, in the light of the reported cases, of whether evidence given to the Treasury officials in reliance on the disclosure policy will be suppressed. That question is by no means settled. Compare Contracchio v. Garrity, 198 F. 2d 382, 388, cert. denied 344 U. S. 866 (CA–1), with In re Liebster, 91 F. Supp. 814.

Reverting to the legal question of interpretation of the policy statements, it seems to me the majority opinion turns on an assumption that any action by a taxpayer which advises a Treasury official that a tax return previously filed by him is incorrect or incomplete is a sufficient disclosure. Paraphrasing the language in part, the majority opinion seems to hold that any word which is sufficient to put the Treasury bloodhounds on the scent of a fraudulent return is a sufficient disclosure, irrespective of what facts are revealed to or concealed thereby from the government and irrespective of what roadblocks the taxpayer may thereafter erect in the way of a determination of the true facts surrounding the fraudulent return. Then, as I construe the majority's expressions, any evidence that the taxpayer may thereafter surrender to Treasury agents must be suppressed, if criminal prosecution is recommended when the fraudulent omission is discovered.

Such a broad statement of the doctrine, I think, is an unwarranted interpretation of the Treasury policy. The Wenchel statement, upon which defendants place principal reliance, when considered in its entirety, carries with it the clear implication that the disclosure contemplated must be a full disclosure of all facts bearing on the false return. Secretary Snyder's statement, issued about 10 days after the Wenchel statement, after referring to the long existent policy, concluded that the application of the policy to a particular taxpayer "presumes, of course, that the repentant taxpayer cooperates with agents of the Bureau in determining the true tax liability."

Furthermore, I think the broad interpretation on which the majority opinion rests ignores persuasive judicial pronouncements bearing on this question. The Court of Appeals for the First Circuit in the Centracchio case, supra, said at 198 F. 2d at page 389: "If it be assumed * * * that evidence disclosed to the Treasury officials on the faith of the announced voluntary disclosure policy, and in compliance with its conditions, should be excluded from evidence in a subsequent criminal trial, it would seem that the taxpayer would have to satisfy the court that he made a voluntary, good faith disclosure of all data necessary to a correct computation of his income tax deficiencies, and that he made such disclosures, before an investigation was under way." And in In re Monroe, 110 F. Supp. 507, aff'd 215 F. 2d 81, cert. denied 348 U. S. 914 (CA–5), the court defined the disclosure policy as containing the specification that the disclosure must be "a complete, fair and honest disclosure, and not a portion." While these authorities are not binding on us, the reasonable interpretation adopted by the jurists who penned those opinions is entitled to our respect and deserving of our serious consideration. See also Chieftain Pontiac Corp. v. Julian, 209 F. 2d 657 (CA–1).

The question, basically, is what would the average taxpayer understand, after reading the Treasury statements, as to what would constitute a sufficient disclosure thereunder. The trial court, consistently with the pronouncements made in Centracchio and Monroe, applied the rule of reason that a "disclosure" requires a good faith disclosure of all facts pertinent to the fraudulent return. This, I believe, is a correct analysis of the policy as announced and, insofar as the majority opinion is based on a less restrictive rule, I respectfully dissent.

The second point on which I believe the majority falls into error is in its treatment of the suppression question as one wholly of law. It seems to me that the majority attempts to try the factual issues de novo and fails to give the requisite weight to the trial court's findings of fact which are essential elements of the question under review.

The weight to be accorded by a court of appeals to such findings has been variously defined. In Roberson v. United States, 165 F. 2d 752, at 754 (CA–6), the court pointed out that "the finding of the trial court on a preliminary question of fact should not be reversed on appeal if it be fairly supported by the evidence." In Nichols v. United States, 176 F. 2d 431 (CA–8), the court said at page 432: "The facts as determined by the trial court are supported by evidence * * * and are binding on this Court." And in Cannon v. United States, 166 F. 2d 85 (CA–5), the court's language was, at pages 86–87: "It cannot be said that the judge's findings on this question were without substantial support. Therefore we will not disturb those findings."

In each of these cases, the findings to which reference was had were made by the trial court in ruling on a motion to suppress evidence allegedly obtained by an illegal search and seizure. While these decisions, as well as the subsequently adopted rule which embodies the then existing case law,[1] pertain only to the classic search and seizure question rather than to the Treasury's voluntary disclosure doctrine, the proceeding to suppress the evidence is the same and the same procedural rules should be applied. If adequate evidence supports the findings upon which the trial court's ruling is based, we cannot disturb those findings. See White v. United States, 194 F. 2d 215, 217, cert. denied 343 U. S. 930.

In its memorandum decision denying defendants' motion, the district court found that defendants had not sustained the burden of proving that a sufficient voluntary disclosure within the purview of the announced policy had been made by them. It found that there had been "no disclosure of an intentional violation or * * * of an intent to defraud the Government" in view of defendants' position, which they maintained at all times, that no tax liability could arise from Shotwell's failure to report black-market receipts, since such receipts and corresponding black-market disbursements by the company "washed-out" each other, and that the disclosure to Sauber was merely an admission of omissions in Shotwell's 1945 and 1946 returns which were based on defendants' alleged good-faith belief that no added tax liability arose from the company's black-market operations.

As bearing on defendants' proof as to their good faith in the so-called disclosure, the court found that such records of the cash transactions in the black-market operations as the corporation had, had been destroyed on instructions of Cain prior to the initial conferences between Shotwell's agents and Sauber; that no bona fide efforts were made by defendants to reconstruct such destroyed records so as to enable the government to determine the amount of tax due, and that figures contained in work sheets turned over to Treasury agents as a part of the alleged disclosure were admittedly fictitious. The court found further that no promise of immunity had been held out to defendants by any representative of the government at any time, and that nothing was done by any agent of the Bureau to lead defendants to believe that the alleged disclosure was accepted as adequate or that there would be no criminal prosecution on account thereof.

Unless we can say that these findings are so lacking in evidentiary support as to require that they be set aside, we have no choice but to affirm the order denying the motion to suppress evidence. A brief recital of the facts underlying this litigation and a brief summary of the evidence before the court at the proceeding on the suppression motion sufficiently demonstrate, in my opinion, that the findings of the court, were amply supported.

When Busby, and later Cain, first approached Sauber, each reported that, during the taxable years 1945 and 1946, Shotwell had sold large quantities of candy to Lubben, or to Lubben's companies, at a premium price above the established OPA ceiling for the commodity. These shipments were invoiced to the buyer at the established ceiling price, and payments therefor at those prices were recorded on Shotwell's books and duly reported on its tax returns. The buyer was billed separately for the above-ceiling portions of the purchase prices. These payments were received by defendants in cash and were neither recorded on the company's books nor reported for income tax purposes. At the same time, it was reported that the cash thus received was paid out by Shotwell as above-ceiling premium prices for the raw materials which it needed, such as corn syrup and chocolate. On the basis of the representations thus made, Sauber, at that time, expressed his opinion that the facts disclosed strictly a civil matter. The indictments were returned after several years of investigation, during which time Shotwell employed Busby, an accountant, to work with the federal agents.

dreds of thousands of dollars were paid out by them, without the benefit of any receipts, to faceless men who were unknown to defendants. At all times during the investigation they refused to advise Treasury agents as to who had received these disbursements. They took the position that to whom such payments were made was none of the Bureau's business, while at the same time fictitious figures were inserted in accounting data given to the agents which purportedly reconstructed the financial history of Shotwell's black-market dealings.

The point to be stressed is that on the record before us we cannot say that the evidence does not support the finding of the trial court that no sufficient disclosure was made. We cannot say that the court's conclusion that "False statements and fraudulent representations made to Government agents under the pretense of a voluntary disclosure can never constitute the basis for immunity from criminal prosecution under any possible interpretation of the so-called voluntary disclosure doctrine" is an erroneous legal statement or that the hypothecated facts included in this statement are not descriptive of the proofs made in this case. Two factual questions were presented to the court below, namely, what was disclosed, and, was the disclosure prompted by the taxpayer's reliance on the announced policy or by some other motive best known to him? The trial tribunal has found that, at most, only a partial disclosure was made; that good-faith cooperation with Treasury agents was lacking, and that such lack of good faith disclosed a purpose to mislead the agents. These findings are adequately supported by the evidence. It is not within our province to second-guess the trial court on factual questions.

In my opinion we cannot overturn the court's further finding that no promise of immunity was held out to defendants, or that no other representations were made, which reasonably led them to believe that no criminal prosecution was contemplated. Sauber's opinion, which he expressed during his initial meeting with Cain, that this was strictly a civil matter, was based on the latter's original statement that black-market income not reported for the taxable years was "washed-out" by black-market expenditures which was, as the court below found, a partial disclosure only of the true facts of the case. The oral testimony as to statements made at various times by Treasury agents that no prosecution was intended—that defendants had nothing to worry about—are disputed by the agents' testimony. Thus this finding is based, in large measure, on the trial court's ruling on the credibility of witnesses.

On the record as a whole, I cannot escape the conviction that the court's interpretation of the voluntary disclosure statements as requiring such a complete disclosure and good-faith effort as to enable the internal revenue agents to assess the additional tax due is a correct interpretation of the offer held out to taxpayers in the Treasury policy statements. Believing that the court's findings of fact are unassailable, I would affirm the decision denying defendants' motion to suppress the evidence and proceed to consider the merits of the appeal.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE UNITED STATES

The primary contention in our petition for certiorari (United States v. Shotwell Manufacturing Co., No. 470, this Term) is that the decision of the Court of Appeals transforms the "voluntary disclosure" policy into a trap for the Government by holding, in effect, that a taxpayer who has made only a partial disclosure and has not cooperated in good faith in a determination of his true taxes, may nonetheless obtain suppression of evidence. The conditional cross-petition would go further; it asserts that the court below erred in failing to direct dismissal of the indictment (see Conditional Cross-Petition, pp. 18-19). While we believe that this contention is without merit for the reasons stated by the Court of Appeals, in view of its relation to the questions presented in the Government's petition for certiorari we think that the Court should review all the questions decided by the court below.

We note, however, that there may be a question as to the timeliness of the cross-petition. The Court of Appeals had under review several orders of the District Court: the denial of the motion to dismiss the indictments, the denial of the motion to suppress evidence, and the judgment of conviction. It affirmed the first, reversed the second, and did not reach the third. The defendants were aggrieved by the first part of the decision, since their claim of immunity was rejected and the indictment sustained. The defendants did not, however, file a petition for rehearing. The cross-petition for certiorari is timely only if the period within which they could seek review was extended by the Government's petition for rehearing, which challenged only that portion of the decision below holding that the motion to suppress should have been granted. v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

MOTION TO REMAND

The Solicitor General, on behalf of the United States, respectfully moves that this case, now pending in this Court on the Government's petition for a writ of certiorari and on respondents' cross-petition, be remanded to the District Court. The reasons for granting this motion are set forth below:

A detailed summary of most of the pertinent facts of record will be found in the Government's petition and defendants' cross-petition. Briefly, defendants were indicted for wilful evasion of income taxes. They moved that certain evidence be suppressed on the ground that it had been voluntarily disclosed to the Government in reliance upon Treasury Department policy. After a three-day pre-trial hearing, the District Court held that the disclosure was neither complete nor made in good faith, and defendants were ultimately found guilty by a jury. The Court of Appeals reversed, holding that the disclosure was in good faith, that it was in complete compliance with the policy, and that it was timely. The District Court had not, however, ruled upon the issue of timeliness. Cf. United States v. Lustig, 163 F. 2d 85, 88, (C. A. 2d), certiorari denied, 332 U. S. 775; Lapides v. United States, 215 F. 2d 253, 255–256 (C. A. 2d).

In all the proceedings in the courts below, and in its petition for certiorari (pp. 10–12), the Government accepted as a fact testimony that defendant Cain and the corporation's accountant, Busby, met with Ernest J. Sauber, then Chief Deputy Collector, some time early in 1948, at which time they revealed to him the fact that the corporation had not reported receipts from black market transactions. The Government also had no reason to doubt Busby's testimony that he prepared the disclosure figures after an intensive investigation lasting several months. None of the several Department of Justice attorneys who handled the prosecution suspected, so far as we can determine, that this was not so.[1]

Now, as the result of an investigation begun by the National Office of the Internal Revenue Service in the early part of 1955, over a year after the conclusion of the trial,[2] additional evidence has come to light.[3] This evidence gives substance and meaning to other evidence in the record and to other facts known to the Department of Justice and the Internal Revenue Service, the full significance of which had not previously been appreciated. Should the District Court be given an opportunity to receive this new evidence, it would support a finding that defendants did not attempt to make a voluntary disclosure until July 1948, after a revenue agent, acting on instructions from his superiors, had already obtained evidence of the corporation's unreported receipts. It would also support a finding that Busby's figures were all prepared during the space of one day in the month of July.[4]

[3] See Exhibit B, infra, paragraphs 4–5; and Exhibit D, infra. The late Assistant United States Attorney Edward Ryan, who represented the Government at the hearing on the motion to suppress, was aware of some of these facts, but he was prevented from perceiving their significance by the manner in which they were presented to him. (See Exhibit C, infra.)

[4] As a result of this new evidence, Sauber, who had been promoted in the interim to District Director, has been removed from office by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and the Department of Justice has begun a grand jury investigation to determine whether various indictable offenses may have been committed, including perjury, obstruction of justice, and conspiracy to evade income taxes for years other than those involved in the present case. An injunction filed by the defendants to prevent the Government from presenting evidence to the grand jury was denied by the district court on April 17, 1956. The Court of Appeals affirmed this order on May 11, 1956.

As appears from the attached affidavits (set out in the Appendix, infra) of the officials of the Internal Revenue Service and the Department of Justice who had immediate responsibility for the case, it was not until November 1955, after the Government's petition for certiorari was filed, and only as a result of the full-scale investigation begun in April 1955 into possible misconduct and wrongdoing on the part of Internal Revenue Service personnel in the Chicago office, that this new evidence was discovered. And it is equally apparent, we believe, that the failure of the Government to discover and present such evidence to the court at an earlier date was not attributable to any lack of due diligence.[5]

It may be that this Court would consider, as did Judge Nordbye, that it is unnecessary to go into the question of the timeliness of the alleged voluntary disclosure, because it was inadequate on other grounds. But if that issue be reached, and if this Court were to review the case in its present posture, the record would be inadequate and incomplete. Furthermore, had the evidence now available been presented to the lower courts the rulings under review might conceivably have been altered, for the majority of the Court of

[5] The Government's petition for certiorari (No. 470, 1955 Term) and the defendants' conditional cross-petition (No. 471) were filed on October 17, 1955. On December 6, 1955, the Solicitor General, in a letter to the Clerk, requested the Court to withhold action on the petitions until the Internal Revenue Service could complete its pending investigation. On June 1, 1956, the Solicitor General informed the Court of the developments in the case to that date, and requested that consideration of the petitions be further deferred. On June 11, 1956, the Court entered an order granting the Solicitor General's motion (351 U. S. 980).

Appeals recognized that a "voluntary disclosure" must be timely:[*]

> When the revenue agents get the scent and are in pursuit of the miscreant, it is too late for him to seek the protection of the Treasury Department's voluntary disclosure policy. Until then its door is open and the welcome mat is out.

In these circumstances, we submit that the interests of justice would be served by remanding this case to the District Court for a further hearing[†] to amplify the record by enabling the parties to present new, additional evidence on the timeliness of the alleged voluntary disclosure. After such hearing the District Court would make such further findings and orders, if any, as the facts and the law may require. Such remand should be without prejudice to the right of the parties to preserve and renew the points presented in the pending petition and cross-petition.

Respectfully submitted,

J. LEE RANKIN,
Solicitor General.

CHARLES K. RICE,
Assistant Attorney General.

APPENDIX

AFFIDAVIT

I am a Special Assistant (Enforcement) to the Chief Counsel for the Internal Revenue Service, in Washington, D. C. My duties include the handling of cases and problems assigned to me by the Chief Counsel or the Assistant Chief Counsel (Enforcement) relating to criminal matters.

The criminal aspects of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company case were considered and processed by the Chief Counsel's field office in Chicago. In early March, 1955, at a time when the appeals of Cain, Sullivan, and Huebner, with respect to their conviction for willfully attempting to evade the income taxes of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company for 1945 and 1946, were pending with the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, there was routed to me for review a matter involving the tax liability of the corporation for the subsequent years 1947, 1948, and 1949. One of the problems was whether negotiations looking toward settlement of the civil tax liabilities of the corporation and Cain for the years 1947, 1948, and 1949 should be undertaken during the pendency of the criminal appeals. Other problems related to the refusal of the corporation to turn over books and records for the years 1944 to 1946, inclusive. My examination of the headquarters file of the Chief Counsel's office with respect to the Shotwell criminal case disclosed that it included excerpts from a report of a revenue agent dated December 13, 1954, covering Cain's liability for the years 1947 to 1949, inclusive, wherein the agent asserted that Cain was attempting to secure a favorable settlement of his civil liabilities for the later years in order to better his position on appeal in the criminal case. The revenue agent also strenuously objected to the manner in which the Chicago office of the Internal Revenue Service was handling Cain's civil liabilities.

In view of the nature of the aforementioned excerpts, it was clear that the full report required examination. I called this matter to the attention of the Assistant Chief Counsel (Enforcement) and a request was made of the Chicago office that it forward a full copy of the agent's report. That report was received in the National Office in Washington on about March 28, 1955. In his transmittal memorandum, the Regional Counsel at Chicago advised the National Office for the first time that the Inspection Office of the Internal Revenue Service, which has the function of investigating allegations of misconduct and wrongdoing on the part of Internal Revenue Service personnel, had begun an inquiry in the case. The full report disclosed, in addition, that the investigation of the individual income tax returns of Cain and Sullivan for the years 1944 to 1946, inclusive, was still incomplete and that there had been no determination whether these individuals had the use and benefit of the unreported and concealed black market receipts involved in the corporation case for the same years. Such evidence would have been strong corroboration of the charge of wilful attempted tax evasion in the Shotwell case. Furthermore, the revenue agent charged that he had been subjected to intense pressure to submit his report although he considered that his investigation was incomplete and that a full development of all the facts was required.

I discussed the revenue agent's report with the Assistant Chief Counsel (Enforcement) and he thereafter took the matter up with the Assistant Commissioner, Inspection, among others. Subsequently, in late April 1955, inspectors were assigned to make a full-scale investigation of the administrative handling of the tax cases of Cain and the Shotwell Manufacturing Company.

At the time I first became actively concerned with the Shotwell case in March of 1955, to my knowledge no question had been raised in the Internal Revenue Service as to the truthfulness of the testimony of former District Director Ernest J. Sauber that in March, 1948, he had been advised of unreported corporate receipts by Cain and his accountant. However, a detailed study of the available material and extensive discussions with the Assistant Chief Counsel (Enforcement) and the Inspectors conducting the investigation gave rise to the strong suspicion that the alleged disclosure might not have taken place in March, 1948. Certainly, by the middle of 1955 this suspicion became firmly fixed. In November, 1955, an inspector assigned to the case brought to the attention of the Chief Counsel's office newly discovered affirmative evidence which was in conflict with the sworn testimony at the suppression hearing before Judge Nordbye that a disclosure had been made in March, 1948. This information, together with other information ascertained by that time, was referred by the Chief Counsel to the Department of Justice on December 1, 1955.

EXHIBIT B

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

District of Columbia, ss:

I, JAMES YADEN, first being duly sworn according to law, depose and state:

1. That I am currently employed as an Inspector with the Internal Revenue Service. That on April 29, 1955, in my capacity of Internal Revenue Inspector, I was assigned by my superiors to conduct an investigation of the administrative handling of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, and related income tax cases for the years 1944 to 1949, inclusive, and that since that date I have had this matter under active investigation. On July 13, 1955, Inspector Harvey M. Lyon was assigned to assist in the investigation in question and has been actively engaged in the conduct of the investigation since that date.

2. That during the investigation of this matter my attention was directed to the discrepancies in the date that The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, initially brought to the attention of the Internal Revenue Service the fact that it had not reported all of its receipts for the years 1944, 1945, and 1946. That according to the record of the testimony given at the hearing on the motion to suppress evidence in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, on about November 12, 1952, Messrs. Byron A. Cain and Leon J. Busby placed the date of the initial contact with Chief Field Deputy Collector Ernest J. Sauber as in January 1948, whereas, Ernest J. Sauber's testimony at the same proceeding placed the date of the initial contact by representatives of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, as on or about March 15, 1948.

3. That witnesses under interrogation by me in October and November 1955, have given statements, based on their personal knowledge that when Special Agent Sam Krane called at the office of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, on June 21, 1948, and requested, among other things, certain unrecorded invoices of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, a telephone call was made by Mr. H. Stanley Graflund, in Mr. Krane's presence, to Byron A. Cain, then president of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel in New York; that Mr. Cain was advised that the special agent had requested certain specific documents and invoices relative to transactions with one David Lubben and General Confections Company, Incorporated; that upon learning of such request, Mr. Cain was surprised, shocked and disturbed; and that, upon terminating the telephone conversation, Mr. Cain turned to his associates, Frank J. Huebner and Harold E. Sullivan, and condemned Mr. Graflund for having given the documents to Mr. Krane.

4. That Mr. Ernest Sauber and Group Supervisor Ralph Johnson stated to me under oath in July, 1955, that they attended a luncheon meeting with Byron A. Cain and Leon J. Busby (at the expense of Mr. Cain or Mr. Busby) at the Chicago Athletic Club, Chicago, Illinois. That Mr. Johnson testified under oath in July, 1955, in my presence, that this luncheon was held sometime between July 21, 1948, when he had the original and amended 1946 income tax returns of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, transferred to his group, and July 30, 1948, when the case of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, was assigned to Internal Revenue Agent Joseph M. Lima for investigation. Group Supervisor Johnson has further testified before me that at this luncheon Mr. Busby displayed figures of the unreported over-ceiling sales received by The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, and offered to turn them over to him.

5. That a witness with personal knowledge stated while under interrogation by me in November, 1955, that in July of 1948 a meeting was held in the Belden-Stratford Hotel in Chicago, Illinois, for the express purpose of preparing the underlying documents from which there could be developed a purported voluntary disclosure of unreported over-ceiling receipts of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, during the years 1944, 1945, and 1946; that these were the figures subsequently turned over to Revenue Agent Lima when he first appeared at the office of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, in August of 1948; and that this witness has also identified the persons present at this meeting, and has stated that these included Mr. Byron A. Cain, Mr. Frank J. Huebner, Mr. Leon J. Busby, and at least three employees of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated.

6. That Mr. Sauber on July 20, 1955, testified under oath before me that he made no record, notation, or contemporaneous memorandum reflecting or pertaining to any contacts he had with Mr. Cain or Mr. Busby in 1948, specifically during the period when purported attempts were being made in behalf of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, to disclose to the Internal Revenue Service, unreported over-ceiling sales.

7. That Mr. Johnson, on July 20, 1955, testified under oath before me that he made no record, notation, or contemporaneous memorandum reflecting or pertaining to any discussion had with, or information received from, Mr. Sauber in 1948 respecting the income tax case of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, or any matter relating thereto.

I have carefully read this statement, consisting of five (5) pages, and it is true, accurate and complete to the best of my knowledge and belief. It has been made freely and voluntarily, without any threats, rewards, promises or duress having been made to or upon me.

JOSEPH M. HOWARD, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

I am now, and have been at all times material herein, an attorney in the Tax Division of the Department of Justice.

The case of United States v. The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Byron A. Cain, Frank J. Huebner and Harold E. Sullivan, was assigned to me shortly after the notices of appeal from the convictions had been filed. I wrote the brief and argued the case for the Government in the Court of Appeals, and I prepared the draft of the Government's petition for a writ of certiorari.

I accepted as a fact the testimony of Ernest J. Sauber that he had conversations with respondent Cain and his accountant, Busby, early in 1948 concerning certain unreported receipts of the corporation. I also accepted as a fact the testimony of Busby that the summaries and compilations which he submitted in support of the alleged voluntary disclosure of unreported receipts were prepared during an intensive investigation lasting several months. I had no suspicion that this testimony might be untrue until I was informed in November 1955 that there was good cause to believe that there had been no conversation between Sauber, Cain and Busby concerning the unreported receipts until sometime after Special Agent Krane had asked in June 1948 for records of the corporation's dealings with David Lubben.

The files of the Department of Justice contain statements, similar to the above paragraph, from all the attorneys who took an active part in the case on behalf of the Government, with the exception of the late Assistant United States Attorney Edward Ryan. The files of the Department also contain statements of the attorneys and revenue agents who worked with Mr. Ryan in his conduct of the case, to the effect that Mr. Ryan at no time expressed any suspicion that the above testimony of Sauber and Busby might not be true.

AFFIDAVIT

VINCENT P. RUSSO, being first duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

I am now, and at all times material hereto have been a trial attorney in the Tax Division of the Department of Justice.

By letter dated April 9, 1956, I was commissioned as a special attorney by the Attorney General of the United States of America under the authority conferred on him by Title 5, United States Code, Section 315. On the same date, Charles A. McNelis, who is an attorney in the Tax Division of the Department of Justice, was likewise commissioned. Both Mr. McNelis and I took the prescribed oath on or about April 10, 1956.

Under my commission I am authorized, among other things, to conduct in the Northern District of Illinois, and in any other judicial district where the jurisdiction thereof lies, any kind of legal proceeding, civil or criminal, including grand jury proceedings and proceedings before committing magistrates which district attorneys are authorized by law to conduct.

On April 10, 1956, pursuant to the authority vested in me by my commission, I undertook a grand jury investigation to determine whether various indictable offenses, including but not limited to perjury, obstruction of justice, and conspiracy to evade and defeat income taxes, may have been committed by anyone, including the Shotwell defendants, either at the hearing on the motion to suppress evidence or at the trial. My first official act under my commission was to procure the issuance of a subpoena duces tecum directed to Leon J. Busby, accountant for the Shotwell Mfg. Co., commanding him to bring with him and to produce before the duly sworn and impaneled April 1956 Term Grand Jury, on April 16, 1956, certain documents.

On April 11, 1956, Homan Mfg. Co., Inc., a corporation formerly named Shotwell Mfg. Co., Byron A. Cain, Harold E. Sullivan and Frank J. Huebner filed a Complaint and Petition in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, naming me, Mr. McNelis and one Charles J. Mammel, an Internal Revenue Agent, as defendants. The plaintiffs sought to enjoin us from presenting evidence to the grand jury and to quash the subpoena duces tecum that had been served on Busby.

On April 12, 1956, Mr. McNelis and I, pro sese and as attorneys for defendant Mammel, filed a Motion to Dismiss the Complaint and Petition on the ground that it failed to state a cause of action upon which relief could be granted. The Complaint and Petition was dismissed by the District Court on April 17, 1956. On the same day the plaintiffs filed a Notice of Appeal and on April 18, 1956, the Court of Appeals entered an order staying the force and effect of the subpoena duces tecum that had been served on Busby. The appeal was argued on May 2, 1956 and on May 11, 1956, the Court of Appeals affirmed the order of the District Court. Homan Mfg. Co., et al. v. Vincent P. Russo, et al., 233 F. 2d 547.

From April 11, 1956, when the injunction suit was filed, to July 12, 1956, the grand jury was in recess with respect to any and all matters relating to the defendants in the Shotwell case. However, during the period in which the grand jury was in recess I personally interviewed and interrogated many witnesses.

From the record of the testimony given on November 12, 1952, at the hearing on the Motion to Suppress Evidence in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, it appears that Byron A. Cain and Leon J. Busby fixed the date of the initial contact with Ernest J. Sauber, then Chief Field Deputy Collector, for the purpose of making a voluntary disclosure, as January 1948. From Sauber's testimony given at the same hearing on November 13, 1952 it appears that he fixed such date as on or about March 15, 1948.

From statements of fact within the personal knowledge of witnesses interviewed and interrogated by me, and from facts and circumstances already in the record, it appears that prior to June 21, 1948 when Special Agent Sam Krane called at the office of the Shotwell Mfg. Co. and requested, among other things, certain records evidencing shipments of merchandise for which no invoices were rendered and for which payment had been received but concealed from the corporate books and records, no disclosure, voluntary or otherwise, had been made by Busby and Cain to Sauber or to any other official or employee of the Internal Revenue Service.

Special Agent Krane's request for records precipitated a telephone call from H. Stanley Graflund, the Comptroller of the Shotwell Mfg. Co., to Byron A. Cain, president of Shotwell, who was then at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel in New York City. Graflund informed Cain of Special Agent Krane's visit and request for documents and of the fact that he had furnished Krane with the documents requested. Cain was upset, swore and used some profanity, and asked Gratlund why he had given the records to Krane.

One Edward T. Urban, an officer of Close & Co., candy manufacturers, also the recipient of black market money from David Lubben, the government's principal witness against the Shotwell Mfg. Co., Byron A. Cain, Harold E. Sullivan, and Frank J. Huebner, has informed me that sometime within the first three weeks of July 1948, at the invitation of Frank J. Huebner, he met and had lunch with Huebner and Harold E. Sullivan at the Chicago Athletic Club; that during the luncheon there was discussed a contemplated purchase by the Shotwell Mfg. Co., Close & Co., and others, who had received overceiling currency payments from Lubben, of Lubben's companies for the purpose of acquiring and destroying the books and records of such companies; and that the acquisition and destruction of such books and records would remove evidence against the proposed purchasers with respect to monies that they had received from Lubben.

Mr. Urban asserted that the discussion at the luncheon positively did not relate to the acquisition of Lubben's books and records for use in accumulating data and figures to be used in the making of any disclosure to the government by the Shotwell Mfg. Co.

From the record it also appears that Sauber testified that immediately after Busby's initial contact with him on or about March 15, 1948, he immediately telephoned one Ralph Johnson, group supervisor, Office of Internal Revenue Agent in Charge, and related the conversation he had had with Busby. Johnson has stated to me that he received no telephone call from Sauber in connection with any purported disclosure to Sauber by Busby or by Busby and Cain in either March or April 1948; that he did receive a telephone call from Sauber sometime prior to July 21, 1948, perhaps sometime in May or June of that year.

Johnson also stated that in a conversation with Sauber prior to the hearing on the Motion to Suppress Evidence, Sauber asked Johnson whether he could state that Sauber had consulted him around March 1948 about the advisability of filing amended returns or the making of a voluntary disclosure in connection with Shotwell's failure to report income resulting from overceiling sales of merchandise. Johnson asserts that he informed Sauber that he "could not go back that far." In this connection, it is pertinent to note that Johnson was not called as a witness at either the suppression hearing or at the trial.

From Busby's testimony in the record it appears that he and members of his staff compiled the data in Government Exhibits 186 and 189 A, B, C, D, and E (the alleged disclosure documents) from the first of February 1948 through the first part of June 1948, or thereabouts.

From statements of fact made to me by witnesses with personal knowledge, it appears that Government Exhibits 186 and 189 A, B, C, D, and E were compiled during the space of a day or two at a meeting at the Belden-Stratford Hotel in Chicago, Illinois, in late July 1948; that no member of Busby's staff aided, assisted or participated in the preparation and compilation of such exhibits; and that such exhibits were prepared and compiled by Leon J. Busby and the following officers or employees of the Shotwell Mfg.

tion, be remanded to the District Court. The reasons for granting this motion are set forth below:

A detailed summary of most of the pertinent facts of record will be found in the Government's petition and defendants' cross-petition. Briefly, defendants were indicted for wilful evasion of income taxes. They moved that certain evidence be suppressed on the ground that it had been voluntarily disclosed to the Government in reliance upon Treasury Department policy. After a three-day pre-trial hearing, the District Court held that the disclosure was neither complete nor made in good faith, and defendants were ultimately found guilty by a jury. The Court of Appeals reversed, holding that the disclosure was in good faith, that it was in complete compliance with the policy, and that it was timely. The District Court had not, however, ruled upon the issue of timeliness. Cf. United States v. Lustig, 163 F. 2d 85, 88 (C. A. 2d), certiorari denied, 332 U. S. 775; Lapides v. United States, 215 F. 2d 253, 255–256 (C. A. 2d).

In all the proceedings in the courts below, and in its petition for certiorari (pp. 10–12), the Government accepted as a fact testimony that defendant Cain and the corporation's accountant, Busby, met with Ernest J. Sauber, then Chief Deputy Collector, some time early in 1948, at which time they revealed to him the fact that the corporation had not reported receipts from black market transactions. The Government also had no reason to doubt Busby's testimony that he prepared the disclosure figures during an intensive investigation lasting several months. None of the several Department of Justice attorneys who handled the prosecution suspected, so far as we can determine, that this was not so.[1]

Now, as the result of an investigation begun by the National Office of the Internal Revenue Service in the early part of 1955, over a year after the conclusion of the trial,[2] additional evidence has come to light.[3] This evidence gives substance and meaning to other evidence[4] in the record and to other facts known to the Department of Justice and the Internal Revenue Service, the full significance of which had not previously been appreciated. Should the District Court be given an opportunity to receive this new evidence, it would support a finding that defendants did not attempt to make a voluntary disclosure until July 1948, after a revenue agent, acting on instructions from his superiors, had already obtained evidence of the corporation's unreported receipts. It would also support a finding that Busby's figures were all prepared during the space of a few days in the month of July.[4]

The late Assistant United States Attorney Edward Ryan, who represented the Government at the hearing on the motion to suppress, was aware of some of these facts, but he was prevented from perceiving their significance by the manner in which they were presented to him. (See Exhibit C, infra.)

[4] As a result of this new evidence, the Department of Justice has begun a grand jury investigation to determine whether various indictable offenses may have been committed, including perjury, obstruction of justice, and conspiracy to evade income taxes for years other than those involved in the present case. As appears from the attached affidavits (set out in the Appendix, infra) of the officials of the Internal Revenue Service and the Department of Justice who had immediate responsibility for the case, it was not until November 1955, after the Government's petition for certiorari was filed, and only as a result of the full-scale investigation begun in April 1955 into possible misconduct and wrongdoing on the part of Internal Revenue Service personnel in the Chicago office, that this new evidence was discovered. And it is equally apparent, we believe, that the failure of the Government to discover and present such evidence to the court at an earlier date was not attributable to any lack of due diligence.[5]

ing evidence to the grand jury was denied by the district court on April 17, 1956. The Court of Appeals affirmed this order on May 11, 1956.

As a further result of the Internal Revenue Service investigation, a number of charges were preferred against Sauber, one arising, in part, out of his conduct relative to the alleged disclosure in this case, and others based on his handling of other unrelated cases. He was placed on administrative annual leave on December 2, 1955, suspended on March 2, 1956, and removed from office on August 6, 1956. The removal was based on two of the unrelated charges, and no findings were made by the Commissioner as to the charges based on the evidence in this case. The Treasury Department has granted Sauber an extension of time to November 14, 1956, within which to file an appeal to the Secretary.

[5] The Government's petition for certiorari (No. 470, 1955 Term) and the defendants' conditional cross-petition (No. 471) were filed on October 17, 1955. On December 6, 1955, the Solicitor General, in a letter to the Clerk, requested the Court to withhold action on the petitions until the Internal Revenue Service could complete its pending investigation. On June 1, 1956, the Solicitor General informed the Court of the developments in the case to

It may be that this Court would consider, as did Judge Nordbye, that it is unnecessary to go into the question of the timeliness of the alleged voluntary disclosure, because it was inadequate on other grounds. But if that issue be reached, and if this Court were to review the case in its present posture, the record would be inadequate and incomplete. Furthermore, had the evidence now available been presented to the lower courts the rulings under review might conceivably have been altered, for the majority of the Court of Appeals recognized that a "voluntary disclosure" must be timely:[6]

> When the revenue agents get the scent and are in pursuit of the miscreant, it is too late for him to seek the protection of the Treasury Department's voluntary disclosure policy. Until then its door is open and the welcome mat is out.

In these circumstances, we submit that the interests of justice would be served by remanding this case to the District Court for a further hearing to amplify that date, and requested that consideration of the petitions be further deferred. On June 11, 1956, the Court entered an order granting the Solicitor General's motion (351 U. S. 980).

[6] See Petition for Certiorari, No. 9, p. 56.

[7] The issues of fact and law raised by the alleged voluntary disclosure, in so far as they related to the defendants' motions to dismiss the indictment and suppress the evidence obtained from such alleged disclosure, were decided solely by the trial judge after a pre-trial hearing. (See Petition for Certiorari, No. 9, pp. 6-7.) These issues, and the evidence bearing on them, were not submitted to the jury, except that the jury was allowed to consider the evidence as to the alleged disclosure in so far as it threw light upon the issue of wilfulness as an element of the sub-the record by enabling the parties to present new, additional evidence on the timeliness of the alleged voluntary disclosure. After such hearing the District Court would make such further findings and orders, if any, as the facts and the law may require. Such remand should be without prejudice to the right of the parties to preserve and renew the points presented in the pending petition and cross-petition.

Respectfully submitted,

J. LEE RANKIN,
Solicitor General.

APPENDIX

AFFIDAVIT

I am a Special Assistant (Enforcement) to the Chief Counsel for the Internal Revenue Service, in Washington, D. C. My duties include the handling of cases and problems assigned to me by the Chief Counsel or the Assistant Chief Counsel (Enforcement) relating to criminal matters.

The criminal aspects of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company case were considered and processed by the Chief Counsel's field office in Chicago. In early March, 1955, at a time when the appeals of Cain, Sullivan, and Huebner, with respect to their conviction for willfully attempting to evade the income taxes of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company for 1945 and 1946, were pending with the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, there was routed to me for review a matter involving the tax liability of the corporation for the subsequent years 1947, 1948, and 1949. One of the problems was whether negotiations looking toward settlement of the civil tax liabilities of the corporation and Cain for the years 1947, 1948, and 1949 should be undertaken during the pendency of the criminal appeals. Other problems related to the refusal of the corporation to turn over books and records for the years 1944 to 1946, inclusive. My examination of the headquarters file of the Chief Counsel's office with respect to the Shotwell criminal case disclosed that it included excerpts from a report of a revenue agent dated December 13, 1954, covering Cain's liability for the years 1947 to 1949, inclusive, wherein the agent asserted that Cain was attempting to secure a favorable settlement of his civil liabilities for the later years in order to better his position on appeal in the criminal case. The revenue agent also strenuously objected to the manner in which the Chicago office of the Internal Revenue Service was handling Cain's civil liabilities.

In view of the nature of the aforementioned excerpts, it was clear that the full report required examination. I called this matter to the attention of the Assistant Chief Counsel (Enforcement) and a request was made of the Chicago office that it forward a full copy of the agent's report. That report was received in the National Office in Washington on about March 28, 1955. In his transmittal memorandum, the Regional Counsel at Chicago advised the National Office for the first time that the Inspection Office of the Internal Revenue Service, which has the function of investigating allegations of misconduct and wrongdoing on the part of Internal Revenue Service personnel, had begun an inquiry in the case. The full report disclosed, in addition, that the investigation of the individual income tax returns of Cain and Sullivan for the years 1944 to 1946, inclusive, was still incomplete and that there had been no determination whether these individuals had the use and benefit of the unreported and concealed black market receipts involved in the corporation case for the same years. Such evidence would have been strong corroboration of the charge of wilful attempted tax evasion in the Shotwell case. Furthermore, the revenue agent charged that he had been subjected to intense pressure to submit his report although he considered that his investigation was incomplete and that a full development of all the facts was required.

I discussed the revenue agent's report with the Assistant Chief Counsel (Enforcement) and he thereafter took the matter up with the Assistant Commissioner, Inspection, among others. Subsequently, in late April 1955, inspectors were assigned to make a full-scale investigation of the administrative handling of the tax cases of Cain and the Shotwell Manufacturing Company.

At the time I first became actively concerned with the Shotwell case in March of 1955, to my knowledge no questions had been raised in the Internal Revenue Service as to the truthfulness of the testimony of former District Director Ernest J. Sauber that in March, 1948, he had been advised of unreported corporate receipts by Cain and his accountant. However, a detailed study of the available material and extensive discussions with the Assistant Chief Counsel (Enforcement) and the Inspectors conducting the investigation gave rise to the strong suspicion that the alleged disclosure might not have taken place in March, 1948. Certainly, by the middle of 1955 this suspicion became firmly fixed. In November, 1955, an inspector assigned to the case brought to the attention of the Chief Counsel's office newly discovered affirmative evidence which was in conflict with the sworn testimony at the suppression hearing before Judge Nordbye that a disclosure had been made in March, 1948. This information, together with other information ascertained by that time, was referred by the Chief Counsel to the Department of Justice on December 1, 1955.

Exhibit B

United States of America,

District of Columbia, ss:

I, James Yaden, first being duly sworn according to law, depose and state:

1. That I am currently employed as an Inspector with the Internal Revenue Service. That on April 29, 1955, in my capacity of Internal Revenue Inspector, I was assigned by my superiors to conduct an investigation of the administrative handling of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, and related income tax cases for the years 1944 to 1949, inclusive, and that since that date I have had this matter under active investigation. On July 13, 1955, Inspector Harvey M. Lyon was assigned to assist in the investigation in question and has been actively engaged in the conduct of the investigation since that date.

2. That during the investigation of this matter my attention was directed to the discrepancies in the date that The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, initially brought to the attention of the Internal Revenue Service the fact that it had not reported all of its receipts for the years 1944, 1945, and 1946. That according to the record of the testimony given at the hearing on the motion to suppress evidence in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, on about November 12, 1952, Messrs. Byron A. Cain and Leon J. Busby placed the date of the initial contact with Chief Field Deputy Collector Ernest J. Sauber as in January 1948, whereas, Ernest J. Sauber's testimony at the same proceeding placed the date of the initial contact by representatives of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, as on or about March 15, 1948.

3. That witnesses under interrogation by me in October and November 1955, have given statements, based on their personal knowledge that when Special Agent Sam Krane called at the office of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, on June 21, 1948, and requested, among other things, certain unrecorded invoices of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, a telephone call was made by Mr. H. Stanley Grafund, in Mr. Krane's presence, to Byron A. Cain, then president of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel in New York; that Mr. Cain was advised that the special agent had requested certain specific documents and invoices relative to transactions with one David Lubben and General Confections Company, Incorporated; that upon learning of such request, Mr. Cain was surprised, shocked and disturbed; and that, upon terminating the telephone conversation, Mr. Cain turned to his associates, Frank J. Huebner and Harold E. Sullivan, and condemned Mr. Grafund for having given the documents to Mr. Krane.

4. That Mr. Ernest Sauber and Group Supervisor Ralph Johnson stated to me under oath in July, 1955, that they attended a luncheon meeting with Byron A. Cain and Leon J. Busby (at the expense of Mr. Cain or Mr. Busby) at the Chicago Athletic Club, Chicago, Illinois. That Mr. Johnson testified under oath in July, 1955, in my presence, that this luncheon was held sometime between July 21, 1948, when he had the original and amended 1946 income tax returns of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, transferred to his group, and July 30, 1948, when the case of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, was assigned to Internal Revenue Agent Joseph M. Lima for investigation. Group Supervisor Johnson has further testified before me that at this luncheon Mr. Busby displayed figures of the unreported over-ceiling sales received by The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, and offered to turn them over to him.

5. That a witness with personal knowledge stated while under interrogation by me in November, 1955, that in July of 1948 a meeting was held in the Belden-Stratford Hotel in Chicago, Illinois, for the express purpose of preparing the underlying documents from which there could be developed a purported voluntary disclosure of unreported over-ceiling receipts of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, during the years 1944, 1945, and 1946; that these were the figures subsequently turned over to Revenue Agent Lima when he first appeared at the office of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, in August of 1948; and that this witness has also identified the persons present at this meeting, and has stated that these included Mr. Byron A. Cain, Mr. Frank J. Huebner, Mr. Leon J. Busby, and at least three employees of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated.

6. That Mr. Sauber on July 20, 1955, testified under oath before me that he made no record, notation, or contemporaneous memorandum reflecting or pertaining to any contacts he had with Mr. Cain or Mr. Busby in 1948, specifically during the period when purported attempts were being made in behalf of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, to disclose to the Internal Revenue Service, unreported over-ceiling sales.

7. That Mr. Johnson, on July 20, 1955, testified under oath before me that he made no record, notation, or contemporaneous memorandum reflecting or pertaining to any discussion had with, or information received from, Mr. Sauber in 1948 respecting the income tax case of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, or any matter relating thereto.

I have carefully read this statement, consisting of five (5) pages, and it is true, accurate and complete to the best of my knowledge and belief. It has been made freely and voluntarily, without any threats, rewards, promises or duress having been made to or upon me.

JAMES E. YADEN,
Inspector, Internal Revenue Service.

Joseph M. Howard, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

I am now, and have been at all times material herein, an attorney in the Tax Division of the Department of Justice.

The case of United States v. The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Byron A. Cain, Frank J. Huebner and Harold E. Sullivan, was assigned to me shortly after the notices of appeal from the convictions had been filed. I wrote the brief and argued the case for the Government in the Court of Appeals, and I prepared the draft of the Government's petition for a writ of certiorari.

I accepted as a fact the testimony of Ernest J. Sauber that he had conversations with respondent Cain and his accountant, Busby, early in 1948 concerning certain unreported receipts of the corporation. I also accepted as a fact the testimony of Busby that the summaries and compilations which he submitted in support of the alleged voluntary disclosure of unreported receipts were prepared during an intensive investigation lasting several months. I had no suspicion that this testimony might be untrue until I was informed in November 1955 that there was good cause to believe that there had been no conversation between Sauber, Cain and Busby concerning the unreported receipts until sometime after Special Agent Keane had asked in June 1948 for records of the corporation's dealings with David Lubben.

The files of the Department of Justice contain statements, similar to the above paragraph, from all the attorneys who took an active part in the case on behalf of the Government, with the exception of the late Assistant United States Attorney Edward Ryan. The files of the Department also contain statements of the attorneys and revenue agents who worked with Mr. Ryan in his conduct of the case, to the effect that Mr. Ryan at no time expressed any suspicion that the above testimony of Sauber and Busby might not be true.

AFFIDAVIT

Vincent P. Russo, being first duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

I am now, and at all times material hereto have been a trial attorney in the Tax Division of the Department of Justice.

By letter dated April 9, 1956, I was commissioned as a special attorney by the Attorney General of the United States of America under the authority conferred on him by Title 5, United States Code, Section 315. On the same date, Charles A. McNelis, who is an attorney in the Tax Division of the Department of Justice, was likewise commissioned. Both Mr. McNelis and I took the prescribed oath on or about April 10, 1956.

Under my commission I am authorized, among other things, to conduct in the Northern District of Illinois, and any other judicial district where the jurisdiction thereof lies, any kind of legal proceeding, civil or criminal, including grand jury proceedings and proceedings before committing magistrates which district attorneys are authorized by law to conduct.

On April 10, 1956, pursuant to the authority vested in me by my commission, I undertook a grand jury investigation to determine whether various indictable offenses, including but not limited to perjury, obstruction of justice, and conspiracy to evade and defeat income taxes, may have been committed by anyone, including the Shotwell defendants, either at the hearing on the motion to suppress evidence or at the trial. My first official act under my commission was to procure the issuance of a subpoena duces tecum directed to Leon J. Busby, accountant for the Shotwell Mfg. Co., commanding him to bring with him and to produce before the duly sworn and impaneled April 1956 Term Grand Jury, on April 16, 1956, certain documents.

On April 11, 1956, Homan Mfg. Co., Inc., a corporation formerly named Shotwell Mfg. Co., Byron A. Cain, Harold E. Sullivan and Frank J. Huebner filed a Complaint and Petition in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, naming me, Mr. McNelis and one Charles J. Mammel, an Internal Revenue Agent, as defendants. The plaintiffs sought to enjoin us from presenting evidence to the grand jury and to quash the subpoena duces tecum that had been served on Busby.

On April 12, 1956, Mr. McNelis and I, pro sese and as attorneys for defendant Mammel, filed a Motion to Dismiss the Complaint and Petition on the ground that it failed to state a cause of action upon which relief could be granted. The Complaint and Petition was dismissed by the District Court on April 17, 1956. On the same day the plaintiffs filed a Notice of Appeal and on April 18, 1956, the Court of Appeals entered an order staying the force and effect of the subpoena duces tecum that had been served on Busby. The appeal was argued on May 2, 1956 and on May 11, 1956, the Court of Appeals affirmed the order of the District Court. Homan

Mfg. Co., et al. v. Vincent P. Russo, et al., 233 F. 2d 547.

From April 11, 1956, when the injunction suit was filed, to July 12, 1956, the grand jury was in recess with respect to any and all matters relating to the defendants in the Shotwell case. However, during the period in which the grand jury was in recess I personally interviewed and interrogated many witnesses.

From the record of the testimony given on November 12, 1952, at the hearing on the Motion to Suppress Evidence in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, it appears that Byron A. Cain and Leon J. Busby fixed the date of the initial contact with Ernest J. Sauber, then Chief Field Deputy Collector, for the purpose of making a voluntary disclosure, as January 1948. From Sauber's testimony given at the same hearing on November 13, 1952 it appears that he fixed such date as on or about March 15, 1948.

From statements of fact within the personal knowledge of witnesses interviewed and interrogated by me, and from facts and circumstances already in the record, it appears that prior to June 21, 1948 when Special Agent Sam Krane called at the office of the Shotwell Mfg. Co. and requested, among other things, certain records evidencing shipments of merchandise for which no invoices were rendered and for which payment had been received but concealed from the corporate books and records, no disclosure, voluntary or otherwise, had been made by Busby and Cain to Sauber or to any other official or employee of the Internal Revenue Service.

Special Agent Krane's request for records precipitated a telephone call from H. Stanley Gratlund, the Comptroller of the Shotwell Mfg. Co., to Byron A.

Cain, president of Shotwell, who was then at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel in New York City. Gratlund informed Cain of Special Agent Krane's visit and request for documents and of the fact that he had furnished Krane with the documents requested. Cain was upset, swore and used some profanity, and asked Gratlund why he had given the records to Krane.

One Edward T. Urban, an officer of Close & Co., candy manufacturers, also the recipient of black market money from David Lubben, the government's principal witness against the Shotwell Mfg. Co., Byron A. Cain, Harold E. Sullivan, and Frank J. Huebner, has informed me that sometime within the first three weeks of July 1948, at the invitation of Frank J. Huebner, he met and had lunch with Huebner and Harold E. Sullivan at the Chicago Athletic Club; that during the luncheon there was discussed a contemplated purchase by the Shotwell Mfg. Co., Close & Co., and others, who had received overceiling currency payments from Lubben, of Lubben's companies for the purpose of acquiring and destroying the books and records of such companies; and that the acquisition and destruction of such books and records would remove evidence against the proposed purchasers with respect to monies that they had received from Lubben.

Mr. Urban asserted that the discussion at the luncheon positively did not relate to the acquisition of Lubben's books and records for use in accumulating data and figures to be used in the making of any disclosure to the government by the Shotwell Mfg. Co.

From the record it also appears that Sauber testified that immediately after Busby's initial contact with him on or about March 15, 1948, he immediately telephoned one Ralph Johnson, group supervisor, Office of Internal Revenue Agent in Charge, and related the conversation he had had with Busby. Johnson has stated to me that he received no telephone call from Sauber in connection with any purported disclosure to Sauber by Busby or by Busby and Cain in either March or April 1948; that he did receive a telephone call from Sauber sometime prior to July 21, 1948, perhaps sometime in May or June of that year.

Johnson also stated that in a conversation with Sauber prior to the hearing on the Motion to Suppress Evidence, Sauber asked Johnson whether he could state that Sauber had consulted him around March 1948 about the advisability of filing amended returns or the making of a voluntary disclosure in connection with Shotwell's failure to report income resulting from overceiling sales of merchandise. Johnson asserts that he informed Sauber that he "could not go back that far." In this connection, it is pertinent to note that Johnson was not called as a witness at either the suppression hearing or at the trial.

From Busby's testimony in the record it appears that he and members of his staff compiled the data in Government Exhibits 186 and 189, A, B, C, D, and E (the alleged disclosure documents) from the first of February 1948 through the first part of June 1948, or thereabouts.

From statements of fact made to me by witnesses with personal knowledge, it appears that Government Exhibits 186 and 189 A, B, C, D, and E were compiled during the space of a day or two at a meeting at the Belden-Stratford Hotel in Chicago, Illinois, in late July 1948; that no member of Busby's staff aided, assisted or participated in the preparation and compilation of such exhibits; and that such exhibits were prepared and compiled by Leon J. Busby and the following officers or employees of the Shotwell Mfg. Co.: Byron A. Cain, Frank J. Huebner, H. Stanley Graflund, Howard Roeser and Martin Ericson.

CHARLES A. MCNELIS, being duly sworn, deposes and says:

I am now, and have been at all times material herein, an attorney in the Tax Division of the Department of Justice.

By letter dated April 9, 1956, I was commissioned as a special attorney by the Attorney General of the United States of America and since that time I have assisted Vincent P. Russo in a grand jury investigation in the Northern District of Illinois to determine whether various offenses in violation of Federal laws may have been committed in said District.

In assisting Mr. Russo I personally have interviewed and interrogated many witnesses outside the presence of the grand jury and have been present while other Federal Government employees, including Mr. Russo, have interviewed and interrogated witnesses.

I have read the affidavit of Vincent P. Russo, Exhibit D, and know all facts alleged therein to be true.

More particularly I wish to state that:

Edward T. Urban has informed me that he attended a meeting, sometime within the first three weeks of July 1948, with Harold E. Sullivan and Frank J. Huebner and discussed with them a plan whereby they and others would acquire Lalbben's books and records for the purpose of destroying them so that evidence of unreported receipts would not be available to the Government.

Ralph Johnson, Internal Revenue Service, Chicago, Illinois, has stated to me that in a conversation with Ernest J. Sauber, prior to the hearing on the Motion to Suppress Evidence, he told Sauber he could not go back as far as March 1948 in fixing the time when Sauber first contacted him about the Shotwell case; that he did receive the first call from Sauber on the Shotwell case prior to July 21, 1948, but not before May 1948; that he is definitely sure that Sauber did not contact him in March or April 1948.

From statements made to me by witnesses with personal knowledge of the facts Shotwell's alleged disclosure documents, Government Exhibits 186 and 189, A–E, inclusive, must have been prepared, in the course of a few days in late July 1948, by Shotwell personnel and Busby without the assistance of any member of Busby's staff.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

ON PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT

SUPPLEMENT TO MOTION TO REMAND

The rapidly unfolding developments in this case require the filing of this supplement to the Government's motion to remand this case to the district court.

The principal purpose of this supplemental memorandum is to bring to the Court's attention the attached affidavit (Appendix, infra) of Frank J. Huebner, one of the three individual defendants in this case. The significance of Huebner's affidavit may be understood from the following brief description of the background of the motion to remand: In 1952, the Shotwell Manufacturing Company and three of its responsible officers, Byron A. Cain, Frank J. Huebner, and Harold E. Sullivan, were indicted for wilful evasion of income taxes. Prior to the trial they moved that certain evidence be suppressed on the ground that it had been voluntarily disclosed to the Government in reliance upon Treasury Department policy. After a three-day pretrial hearing, the district court (Judge Nordbye) found that the disclosure was neither complete nor made in good faith, and denied the motion to suppress. The defendants were tried and convicted. On appeal, the Court of Appeals (Judge Lindley dissenting) reversed, holding that the disclosure was in good faith, that it was in complete compliance with the so-called voluntary disclosure policy, and that it was timely. Accordingly, the convictions were reversed with instructions to grant the motion to suppress.

In its petition for certiorari, filed October 1955, the Government contended that the court below erred in setting aside Judge Nordbye's finding that the defendants' alleged disclosure was incomplete and lacking in good faith. The petition for certiorari noted (p. 23) that Judge Nordbye specifically refrained from making a finding as to the timeliness of the disclosure, a question as to which the evidence before him was conflicting. The Government argued in its petition for certiorari that the case should at least have been remanded by the Court of Appeals to permit the trial court to pass upon this disputed issue of fact, if it were deemed significant.

Subsequent to the filing of the petition for certiorari, and as the result of an investigation initfated by the national office of the Internal Revenue Service early in 1955, additional evidence began to come to light. Such evidence, some of which has already been outlined in the motion to remand filed by the Government on November 15, 1956, indicates that the record now before this Court contains perjured testimony, both by defense witnesses and by Government witnesses, as to the circumstances of the alleged disclosure. In one aspect, the new evidence indicates that the officers of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company made no move to disclose the unreported corporate receipts until they discovered that the Treasury Department was already aware of them. Such evidence would unquestionably have a high degree of relevance on the issue of the timeliness of the disclosure, a matter left undecided by Judge Nordbye. In addition, it would strongly support Judge Nordbye's finding of fact that the disclosure was totally lacking in good faith.

Sullivan and Cain took the stand and testified, the former at the trial, the latter both at the suppression hearing and at the trial. Huebner never testified. He states in the attached affidavit (Appendix, infra, p. 10) that "I was not asked to testify at either the trial or suppression hearing because I had stated I would not lie on the stand."

Huebner's affidavit states that he has now voluntarily appeared before the grand jury which is investigating various facets of this case, and has testified before the grand jury "to these and other facts concerning the voluntary disclosure alleged to have been made for and on behalf of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company". (Appendix, infra, p. 10) Huebner has also filed a motion in this Court to withdraw from opposition to the Government's petition for certiorari, and to consent to the Government's motion that the case be remanded to the district court.

On such remand, Huebner's testimony, as reflected in the attached affidavit, will contradict the testimony given by Sullivan and Cain on several crucial points: (1) Huebner states that the corporation received over-ceiling premium currency payments from Libbey during the period from November 1944 to December 1946. Sullivan and Cain testified (R. 2546-2550, 2650) that such payments were received only from September 1945 until the summer of 1946.[1] (2) Huebner states that he was never informed that a voluntary disclosure either had been made, or would be made, until the meeting at the Belden-Stratford Hotel in July 1948, and that he was then given to understand that it had been agreed that the date of the disclosure would be set at June 15, 1948. Cain and his accountant Busby testified (R. 176, 228-229) that a disclosure had been made to then Chief Deputy Collector Sauber as early as January 1948, and that Huebner had participated in the decision to make the disclosure.[2] (3)

[1] This was the critical factual issue before the jury. Compare Petition for Certiorari (No. 9), page 14, with Brief of Respondents in Opposition, pages 5-6.

[2] Sauber, who had already committed himself in a written statement over a year before the suppression hearing (R. 3154), testified that the disclosure took place about March 15, 1948. Sauber has not been exonerated from perjury in this respect, as Sullivan and Cain assert in their Answer to the Motion to Remand (pp. 11, 26).

Huebner states that, after the Belden-Stratford meeting, he was informed by Cain and Busby that the corporation's case had been "fixed" and that it would be settled for a tax deficiency of only $20,000, but that someone in the revenue office destroyed the settlement papers.

The Government reiterates its belief that Judge Nordbye's finding that the alleged disclosure was totally lacking in good faith is abundantly supported by the facts already in the record, as summarized in the Government's petition for certiorari. We think that, on the record already made, the defendants' conviction was amply justified by the evidence and should have been affirmed on appeal. The new evidence which has come to light confirms and amplifies the inadequacies of the "voluntary disclosure" defense. In no sense is the Government moving, as the defendants assert, for "a partial new trial in order to validate a conviction already obtained." Rather, the Government requests a remand to the district court solely in order that the case should not be reviewed by this Court on the basis of a record which now clearly appears to contain perjured testimony and to be incomplete and inaccurate, on the timeliness, extent, and good faith of the alleged disclosure relied on by the defendants. We suggest that this Court may not desire to rule on the issues relating to the alleged disclosure on the basis of such a record, and that it would be in the interests of justice to remand this case to the district court for a full investigation and determination of the matters involved. Neither this Court nor the Court of Appeals is properly equipped for the task of receiving and appraising testimony and evidence bearing on the controverted questions of fact. Ascertainment of where the whole truth lies with respect to the alleged disclosure is a function, we believe, for the trial court in the first instance.

Respectfully submitted.

Solicitor General.

Frank J. Huebner, being first duly sworn according to law, deposes and says:

I am one of the defendants in the case of United States of America v. The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Byron A. Cain, Frank J. Huebner, and Harold E. Sullivan, which case is now pending before the Supreme Court of the United States on the petition of the United States for a writ of certiorari to the Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit. I did not testify as a witness at the trial of that case or at the hearing held on the motion of the defendants to suppress evidence.

During the years 1944 to May, 1952, I was Vice President and Plant Manager, in 1947 General Manager, of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Chicago, Illinois. I also was, and so far as I know still am, a director and officer of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company (now known as the Homan Mfg. Co., Inc.).

I know, from my own knowledge, that over-ceiling premium payments in currency were received by Shotwell from David G. Lubben during the period from November, 1944, to sometime in December, 1946, that none of these payments were recorded on Shotwell's books and that Cain and Sullivan were aware of these facts as they occurred. Solicitor General, testified that these payments were received only during the period beginning in the late summer of 1945 and ending in July, 1946. I know of my own knowledge that this testimony was untrue.

During a period from about March, 1946 to about July, 1946, uninvoiced shipments of candy were made to Lubben by Shotwell. Payment for these shipments was made by or on behalf of Lubben in currency. So far as I know, none of the payments were recorded on the regular books and records of Shotwell or reported on the corporate income tax return for 1946. I was directed by Harold E. Sullivan, to make the uninvoiced shipments and to receive currency in payment for them. Byron A. Cain at about the same time also authorized me by telephone to pursue this procedure. Some of the uninvoiced shipments were made in the name of the ABC Candy Company, which was a fictitious and non-existent concern.

During the first six months of 1948, I had several conversations with Cain and Sullivan about the tax difficulties Lubben could get us into. At no time during that period did Cain, Sullivan or Leon J. Busby, the Shotwell accountant, mention to me that Shotwell had made a voluntary disclosure to the Internal Revenue Service, that it was contemplated a voluntary disclosure would be made, or that it would be claimed that a voluntary disclosure had been made.

Early in July, 1948, on Sullivan's instructions, I arranged a meeting at the Chicago Athletic Club with one Edward Urban of Close and Company, which also had black market transactions with Lubben. At the meeting, Sullivan discussed with Urban the possibility of forming a group to purchase Lubben's business interests in order that Lubben's books and records could be obtained. No mention of voluntary disclosure was made at the meeting.

In about the middle of July, 1948, I met with Cain, Busby and certain other Shotwell officials at the Belden-Stratford Hotel in Chicago, Illinois. We reconstructed all of the black market payments received from Lubben from 1944 through 1946 in the amount of about $389,000. Cain stated that the purpose of the meeting was to prepare figures so that a disclosure could be made to the Internal Revenue Service. The over-ceiling disbursement figures prepared by Cain to offset the black market receipts had no basis in fact but were taken out of thin air.

Prior to this meeting at the Belden-Stratford, so far as I know, no work was done by anyone relative to compiling data for the purpose of making a voluntary disclosure to the Government. I was given to understand that it had been agreed that the date of the disclosure would be set at June 15, 1948.

Sometime in late July, 1948, at Cain's request, I gave him $5,000.00 in currency and again in August, 1948, another $5,000.00 in currency. When he asked me for this money Cain told me he needed it to take care of and fix the tax difficulty we were in. He also stated that he and Sullivan did not have the cash and that they did not want to cash any checks because checks could be easily traced. Later, Cain told me he had turned the money over to someone to take care of a tax fix.

Cain also told me, sometime in about late July, 1948, that he was about to settle the tax case. Shortly thereafter, Cain told me he had settled the tax case for a tax deficiency of $20,000.00.

In October, 1948, Busby told me that there had been a meeting in the fraud division at the Internal Revenue office and that hell had broken loose; that some Internal Revenue people had a heck of a time destroying papers that had been made up for the purpose of billing Shotwell for taxes.

On November 13, 1952, Sauber testified at the hearing on the defendant's motion to suppress evidence that Busby and Cain had contacted him in March, 1948. After hearing Sauber testify, I told Cain I thought the voluntary disclosure date was supposed to be June 15, 1948. Cain said to me, "Ssshhh! There is nobody that knows anything about this. Keep quiet."

I was not asked to testify at either the trial or suppression hearing because I had stated I would not lie on the stand. I have testified voluntarily before the April 1956 Term Grand Jury, Northern District of Illinois, to these and other facts concerning the voluntary disclosure alleged to have been made for and on behalf of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company.

SAMUEL C. BRODY, PETITIONER

v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

ON PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FIRST CIRCUIT

MEMORANDUM FOR THE UNITED STATES IN OPPOSITION

The basic question in this case is whether the taxpayer's refusal to answer the questions contained in the District Court's order of January 10, 1956, was justified in the particular circumstances of the case. The critical facts, as found by the District Court after a full hearing and as reviewed in detail by the Court of Appeals, are as follows: The order of January 10 was entered by the court at a proceeding at which petitioner's counsel entered a general appearance; the order was approved by petitioner's counsel (Pet. 25). Petitioner discussed with counsel the possibility of asserting his privilege under the Fifth Amendment and affirmatively decided not to assert it (Pet. 38). Petitioner did not claim the privilege when the order of January 10 was entered, nor when he refused to comply with it, nor when he was ordered to show cause why he should not be held in contempt (Pet. 35–37). On the contrary, at the latter time petitioner explained to the court that his deliberate refusal to provide the requested information was so that he would be in a better bargaining position to negotiate a compromise of his tax liabilities (R. 10). The court found as a fact that his failure to comply with the order of January 10 had nothing whatever to do with an apprehension that answers to the questions might involve him in self-incrimination (R. 28). These findings have been considered by the two courts, and are fully supported by the record.

In the light of these facts, petitioner is thus asserting that his refusal, for reasons of possible personal advantage, to comply with a valid court order to which his counsel consented was nevertheless justified because of the existence of his Fifth Amendment privilege. The short answer is, however, that he did not assert the privilege at any relevant time and it had nothing whatever to do with his refusal. On the facts here, the so-called questions of law raised by petitioner are not presented.

There is no merit in petitioner's contention that he was afforded no opportunity to invoke his privilege. His counsel was present in court when the order of January 10 was entered, and agreed to it. During the entire five months' period in which the order was outstanding, petitioner at no time nor in any way suggested that he wished to invoke the Fifth Amendment. When ordered to show cause why he should not be held in contempt he answered, but again made no allusion to the Fifth Amendment. Finally, the contempt proceeding was reopened so that petitioner could assert his claimed privilege. At this stage, the least petitioner would be required to show was that his refusal to comply was because of the Fifth Amendment privilege. This he was unable to do, the facts being to the contrary.

There is no conflict, nor is any asserted. The decision below is correct, and further review is not warranted. The petition for a writ of certiorari should be denied.

Respectfully submitted.

THE SHOTWELL MANUFACTURING COMPANY, BYRON A. CAIN, AND HAROLD E. SULLIVAN

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT

OPINIONS BELOW

The opinion of Judge Nordbye[1] denying respondents' motion to suppress evidence (R. 3242–47) has not been reported. The majority and dissenting opinions of the Court of Appeals (R. 3339–60) are reported at 225 F. 2d 394.

JURISDICTION

The judgments of the Court of Appeals were entered on June 15, 1955 (R. 3361–64), and a petition for rehearing, timely filed, was denied on August 18,

[1] Judge Nordbye, District Judge for the District of Minnesota, was specially appointed by Chief Justice Vinson to try this case in the Northern District of Illinois. (R. 116–117.)

1955 (R. 3365). On September 16, 1955, by order of Mr. Justice Reed, the time for filing a petition for certiorari on behalf of the United States was extended to and including October 17, 1955. (R. 3365.) The Government's petition for certiorari was filed on October 17, 1955. Respondents filed a conditional cross-petition for certiorari. On June 11, 1956, this Court entered an order (R. 3366) granting the motion of the Solicitor General to defer consideration of the petitions for writs of certiorari. Thereafter, the Government filed a motion to remand, later amended and supplemented, to which respondents filed answers. Following this, respondent Huebner moved to withdraw from the conditional cross-petition for certiorari and from opposition to the Government's petition for certiorari, consenting in addition to the motion to remand. This Court denied the respondents' cross-petition, granted respondent Huebner's motions, and granted the Government's petition for certiorari, "limited to the issues raised in the amended motion to remand and supplement thereto and the respondents' answer to the amended motion to remand." (352 U. S. 997–998.) The jurisdiction of this Court rests upon 28 U. S. C., Section 1254 (1).

QUESTION PRESENTED

Whether, in the present posture of the case and in view of the unusual circumstances involved, the interests of justice would be served by vacating the judgments of the Court of Appeals and remanding the case to the district court with directions to take further evidence and make supplementary findings on the issues raised by respondents' pre-trial motion to suppress evidence.

STATUTE INVOLVED

28 U. S. C., SEC. 2106. Determination

> The Supreme Court or any other court of appellate jurisdiction may affirm, modify, vacate, set aside or reverse any judgment, decree, or order of a court lawfully brought before it for review, and may remand the cause and direct the entry of such appropriate judgment, decree, or order, or require such further proceedings to be had as may be just under the circumstances.

STATEMENT

On March 14, 1952, an indictment in two counts was returned in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois charging respondent Shotwell Manufacturing Company, a corporation, and respondents Cain, Sullivan and Huebner as officers thereof, with wilful attempted evasion of a large part of the corporation's income tax for each of the years 1945 and 1946, by filing false and fraudulent corporate income tax returns, in violation of Section 145 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939. (R. 4–7.) The amounts of the corporation's reported and correct net income and tax liability as alleged in the indictment were as follows:

Year	Reported		Correct
	Income	Tax	Income	Tax
1945	$561,064	$370,638	$738,210	$534,288
1946	1,202,917	457,012	1,526,400	579,970

As set forth in the bill of particulars (R. 8–9), the unreported income consisted of premium payments received by the corporation in excess of the recorded invoice and O. P. A. ceiling prices and payments received for wholly unrecorded sales. After a jury trial which lasted five weeks, respondents were found guilty as charged. (R. 2990.) The corporation was fined $10,000 on each count. The individual respondents were sentenced to imprisonment for three years on each count, the sentences to run concurrently, and were fined varying amounts. (R. 3012, 3015–16, 3018–19, 3075, 3221–24, 3256–57.)

The Court of Appeals, with Judge Lindley dissenting, reversed on the ground that the trial court erred in denying respondents' pre-trial motion to suppress evidence, and it remanded the case for a new trial with instructions to sustain the motion.[2] (R. 3361–64.) A petition for rehearing was denied (R. 3365), and the Government petitioned this Court for a writ of certiorari.[3]

After the petition for certiorari had been filed, the Department of Justice received information from the Internal Revenue Service to the effect that an investigation then in progress indicated that perjured testimony relevant to the issues raised by the motion to suppress had been given at the hearing on the motion and at the trial. (See Appendix, infra, pp. 40–46, for a chronological statement of the history of this litigation.) The Solicitor General immediately advised this Court of the receipt of such information[4] and thereafter filed in this Court a motion, later amended and supplemented, to remand the case to the district court for the taking of further evidence. Respondents filed an answer opposing the motion. Thereafter, respondent Huebner filed and this Court granted (352 U. S. 997) a motion to withdraw from opposition to the Government's petition for writ of certiorari, and at the same time, Huebner consented to the motion to remand. This Court granted the Government's petition for writ of certiorari "limited to the issues raised in the amended motion to remand and supplement thereto and the respondents' answer to the amended motion to remand." (R. 3367.)

[2] In view of this determination, the majority found it unnecessary to consider other errors alleged by respondents.

[3] Respondents filed a conditional cross-petition for writ of certiorari on Oct. 17, 1955.

A. THE VOLUNTARY DISCLOSURE POLICY

Respondents' pre-trial motion to suppress was predicated on the contention that there had been a voluntary disclosure to the Treasury Department at a time when the policy of that Department was to grant immunity from criminal prosecution to taxpayers making such disclosures. (R. 120–127, 144–145.) This so-called "voluntary disclosure policy" was publicly announced in 1945 and was withdrawn in January 1952. (R. 3125–26, 3142.) The policy provided generally that, in cases in which taxpayers made voluntary disclosures of intentional evasions before an investigation had been begun, the Treasury Department would assess the tax deficiency plus civil penalties, including the 50% fraud penalty, but would not refer the case to the Department of Justice for criminal prosecution. (R. 3136–37.) In the two most definitive pronouncements of Treasury Department officials on the subject, it was stated that taxpayers must cut "square corners" with the Government (R. 3140), and that the voluntary disclosure policy assumed "that the repentant taxpayer cooperates with agents of the Bureau in determining the true tax liability." (R. 3141.) These two statements, one by J. P. Wenchel, Chief Counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the other by Secretary of the Treasury Snyder, were issued in May 1947.[5] (R. 3132–40.)

B. THE ALLEGATIONS OF THE MOTION

Respondents' motion (R. 120–127), as amended (R. 144–145), alleged in substance that, in reliance on the voluntary disclosure policy and before any investigation had been initiated, respondents came forward and made such a disclosure with respect to the tax returns of the corporation for the years covered by the indictment. Respondents alleged that they had informed a Treasury official that receipts from black market transactions had not been recorded on the corporation's books or reported in its tax returns and that these receipts in turn had been expended by the corporation for over-ceiling price purchases of raw materials which purchases were likewise not recorded on the books or reflected in the tax returns, with the result that no actual gain was realized from the black market transactions. Further, respondents asserted that the matter was brought to the attention of the Treasury Department since its then legal position was that expenditures for materials in excess of O. P. A. ceiling prices could not be included in cost of goods sold for the purpose of determining taxable income,[6] so that, under the Treasury Department's interpretation of the law, the corporation owed additional taxes for those years; and that after Treasury officials had acknowledged the sufficiency and timeliness of this disclosure, respondents made available to Treasury agents the books and records of the corporation and communicated information not reflected in those records material to the "omissions and misstatements" in the corporate returns and otherwise cooperated with the examining agents to the utmost of their ability. The motion prayed for the suppression of all evidence obtained from respondents subsequent to this disclosure on the grounds (R. 123)—

> that the actions aforesaid of the Bureau of Internal Revenue constituted an improper inducement of a confession or admission of facts upon which a criminal prosecution might be based and an illegal search and seizure of the books, papers and records of the [respondents], and > that, in consequence, the admission in evidence of all books, records, papers and statements so obtained, and any copies thereof or data procured therefrom as a result of information obtained therefrom would violate the rights of the [respondents] * * * under the Fourth and Fifth Amendments to the Constitution * * * and on the further ground (R. 145)—

[6] This question was then pending before the courts. In December 1948 The Tax Court overruled the Commissioner and held such deductions allowable (Sullenger v. Commissioner, 11 T. C. 1076), and this was followed by a number of decisions to the same effect in the courts of appeals. (R. 144–145, 427–428.) The Commissioner acquiesced in these decisions shortly prior to the trial of this case. (R. 428.)

> that even if the said disclosure was insufficient or entirely, [sic, should be untimely] or both, [petitioner], by reason of the premises, is estopped from so asserting, and * * * [respondents] are, nevertheless, entitled to the relief by this motion requested.

Affidavits were submitted in support of the motion by respondent Cain (R. 127–132) and by Leon J. Busby, an accountant engaged by respondents (R. 18–24).

After a three-day hearing, at which eleven witnesses testified including respondent Cain (R. 150–448), the motion was denied. The evidence at the hearing was in sharp conflict on many points, and Judge Nordbye stated at the close that he felt it would be inappropriate to express his opinion as to the credibility of the witnesses and the good faith of respondents prior to trial, and he reserved the right to file a memorandum of findings of fact and conclusions of law upon completion of the trial. (R. 447-448.) This memorandum was later filed. (R. 3242–47.)

C. THE EVIDENCE

The evidence relating to the issues raised by the motion to suppress may be summarized as follows:[7]

At all times material hereto, respondent Shotwell Manufacturing Company was engaged in the manufacture and sale of candy and marshmallows. Its office and plant were located in Chicago, Illinois. The principal stockholders of the corporation were respondents Cain and Sullivan and their families.[8] Cain became president of the corporation prior to 1945. Sullivan, an attorney whose association with the corporation dates back to 1929, was general counsel, a director and, beginning in 1946, executive vice-president. Huebner, a long time employee of the corporation, was a vice-president and general manager in charge of plant operations; he owned less than one percent of the stock. (R. 747, 748, 1707, 1772, 1791, 2542, 2635, 2637, 2648.) Since 1942, the accounting firm of Busby and Oury performed accounting services for the corporation. (R. 168, 1820–1821.)

In the latter part of 1943, David G. Lubben, a candy dealer, offered to sell the corporation a large quantity of scarce chocolate if he were appointed broker for the corporation's candies in the New York area, and an agreement to this effect was made. In August or September 1944, Huebner asked Lubben, who had been seeking increased shipments, if he would be willing to pay ten cents a pound in cash above the invoice price for bulk candy, the shipments to be invoiced at the prevailing O. P. A. ceiling price. Lubben readily agreed to this and, after Huebner conferred with Cain, the corporation began to ship Lubben large quantities of candy. (R. 792–797, 2055–2061, 2543–2544.) During 1945 and 1946, Lubben, in accordance with the agreement, personally made cash payments to Huebner, in excess of the invoice and O. P. A. ceiling prices, totaling more than $290,000. (R. 811–855, 864–876, 888–905, 910–933, 1417–1516, 1524–1534, 1538–1568, 1573–1577.) Other similar cash payments were made to Huebner by Lubben's employees, Heitman and Hankermyer (R. 876–892, 1369–1377, 1554), and by his brother-in-law, Moran (R. 1297–1303, 1309–1311). In one instance, Cain directed Lubben to pay $1,450 of the overages due the corporation to a Mrs. Krasne, in connection with the purchase of jewelry by Cain's wife. (R. 888–891, 1286–1288, 2628–2629.) The Government's expert witness at the trial testified that, upon the basis of the evidence before the jury, the over-ceiling cash receipts for the years 1945 and 1946 totaled $177,146, and $211,193 respectively. (R. 1838–1840, 1845–1846, 2064–2066.)

[7] The summary includes the evidence presented both at the hearing on the motion to suppress and at the trial. In passing upon a ruling such as this, the reviewing court may properly consider the whole record, not merely the evidence adduced prior to the ruling. Carroll v. United States, 267 U. S. 132, 162; Reid v. United States, 209 F. 2d 893, 896 (C. A. 5th).

[8] In 1945, Cain and Sullivan and their families owned approximately 48 per cent of the corporation's stock which holdings were increased in 1946 to about 75 per cent. (R. 1793.)

In addition to the above transactions, in which the invoice price was paid by check and only the overage in cash, the corporation made a number of shipments to Lubben during 1946, referred to herein as "unbilled shipments," for which no invoice was made out and for which Lubben paid both the ceiling price and the overage to Huebner in cash. (R. 802–805, 953–962.) The unbilled shipments began in March 1946 after Huebner told Lubben that he could have a lot of merchandise on condition that he pay both the ceiling price and the overage in cash and accept shipment without an invoice. (R. 933–935.) The Government's expert witness testified at the trial that, on the basis of the evidence before the jury, the unbilled shipments in 1946 totaled $65,532. (R. 1845–1946.)

When Lubben made the aforementioned cash payments to Huebner, the latter invariably divided the money into three piles with the comment that one was for Cain, one for Sullivan and one for himself. (R. 827, 831, 837, 840, 903–904, 992–995.)

No part of the cash payments made by Lubben was recorded on the corporation's books or reported in its tax returns. (R. 1844–1846.) Certain informal records were kept by the corporation of the cash receipts and their disbursement during a part of the period in question. (R. 785, 1706, 1741–1742.) But when Busby prepared the corporation's tax returns for 1945 and 1946, he was given to understand that there had been no violation of O. P. A. regulations by the corporation and that all receipts and disbursements had been recorded in the corporation's books. (R. 1822–1825.)

corporation, both Cain and Sullivan had repeatedly impressed upon Lubben that the corporation was not reporting the cash receipts as income and that no record should be kept by Lubben of his cash payments. (R. 860–863, 920–922.) Although Lubben told Cain and Sullivan that he was not keeping any records of his cash payments, he did in fact make and retain a record of the payments (R. 866), and sometime around the end of January 1948, Lubben told Cain that he had a record of the over-ceiling and other cash payments.[9]

In January or February 1948,[10] Cain sent Busby and H. Stanley Grafflund, the corporation's comptroller, to Lubben's plant in Hillsdale, New Jersey, to examine Lubben's books in connection with a $50,000 loan which Lubben had requested from respondents. (R. 1757–1758.) Busby testified as a defense witness at the hearing on the motion and as a Government witness at the trial[11] that during this trip he learned for the first time, in the course of a conversation with Grafflund, that Lubben had made over-ceiling cash payments for merchandise received from the corporation. (R. 169–171, 1826–1829.) He testified further that immediately upon his return to Chicago, he discussed the matter with Cain and Sullivan who told him that all the black market receipts had been used

[10] Busby and Grafflund placed this trip in January 1948 (R. 1757, 1825); Lubben placed it in February (R. 1207).

[11] Later in the trial he testified as a defense witness. (R. 2741.)

by the corporation for the purchase of raw materials; that no records had been kept of either the receipts or the expenditures because they did not wish to reveal violations of O. P. A. regulations; and that they had not reported the receipts as income because they considered the expenditures for black market purchases deductible and the whole series of transactions a "wash-out" taxwise. Upon hearing this, Busby allegedly told Cain and Sullivan that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue would not allow taxpayers to include in cost of goods sold payments above ceiling prices for the purchase of materials; that they had a tax problem; and that (R. 172) "if they made the disclosure which was in my opinion the thing to do and customary, there probably would be nothing to it except they would clear The Shotwell [sic] of omissions from the tax returns." (R. 170–172, 204–207, 209–211, 213–214, 1826–1832.). It was Busby's testimony that acting under instructions from Cain and Sullivan he went to the office of then Chief Deputy Collector of Internal Revenue Sauber about the middle of January 1948 and without revealing his clients' names discussed with Sauber the factual situation related to him by Cain and Sullivan; that Sauber advised him that (R. 175) "if the disclosure is timely and the facts that I had related to him were correct, he saw no reason why the immunity policy of the Bureau should not be applied in this particular matter"; and that on the following day at a meeting at which Cain, Sullivan and Huebner were present, he gave a report of his conversation with Sauber (R. 176). Further, that he was then instructed by Cain to (R. 177) "go in and talk to the Collector's Office and disclose the whole affairs [sic], whole details as I have outlined it [sic] to you and get their instructions * * * as to how we should proceed"; and that within a few days he returned to Sauber's office, discussed the whole matter with Sauber and revealed the identity of the respondents. Sauber allegedly then told Busby that the disclosure was sufficient and timely but that the Internal Revenue Service would not allow deductions for over-ceiling purchases of raw materials and suggested that Busby prepare a summary of the corporation's over-the-ceiling receipts, adding that he would send an agent out to verify the results. (R. 175–181, 214–216, 251–252.) Cain allegedly accompanied Busby on a subsequent visit to Sauber in which the whole subject was discussed, and Cain told Sauber that, while the corporation was ready to pay any tax the Government claimed, it would at a later date probably contest the Commissioner's refusal to allow deductions for its over-the-ceiling expenditures. (R. 230–232, 251–253, 1948)

It was the testimony of both Cain and Busby that, after the initial meetings with Sauber, Cain directed Busby to make an investigation of the black market receipts; that thereafter Busby conducted an exhaustive investigation over a period of several months with the assistance of Cain, Sullivan, Huebner and members of his own staff; and that the results of the investigation were summarized in the schedule which he submitted to Revenue Agent Lima when the latter appeared at the corporation's office sometime around the first of August 1948. According to Busby's summary,* the corporation's unreported receipts from Lubben for the years 1944, 1945 and 1946 totaled about $378,000. The summary also purported to show that with the exception of some $6,000 (which had been reported as income), all the unreported receipts had been expended for the purchase of raw materials. (R. 1942–1944, 2553–2558, 2563–2564, 2801–2805, 2808, 2816, 2838–2839.)

Sauber, testifying as a Government witness, placed his first conversation with Busby on or about March 15, 1948. Sauber's account was as follows: About a week after Busby's initial visit, the latter returned with Cain at which time he was told by Busby and Cain that the corporation's black market receipts were not reported; that the over-ceiling receipts had been paid out for over-the-ceiling purchases, and the balance declared as income, but that there were no records and it would be extremely difficult to reconstruct the figures and prepare accurate amended returns. He advised Cain and Busby to call everyone together who had anything to do with the transactions, reconstruct the receipts and expenditures as accurately as they could, and then request an audit of the returns. He told Cain and Busby he thought it was strictly a "civil case," in view of the facts related to him, but at no time did he tell them that their revelations constituted a timely and sufficient voluntary disclosure. (R. 282–285, 291.) Sauber testified that in the latter part of April, Cain informed him that the Shotwell officers had followed his advice, that they had a meeting of all the Shotwell personnel who were connected with the black market transactions, that they had prepared the figures, and that Cain wanted to submit the figures and have the returns audited. (R. 286.) Cain allegedly called him several times thereafter to ask when an audit of the company records would be commenced. (R. 287.)

On June 21, 1948, Special Agent Krane visited the corporation's office and requested certain records and information from Gratlund relating to transactions with Lubben. His visit to the corporation office was occasioned by a telephone call from the Treasury Intelligence Unit in New York, which by March 4, 1948, was in possession of information concerning over-ceiling payments and unbilled shipments involving Shotwell and the Lubben companies. (Def. Exs. 5 & 6, R. 3159-3163; R. 334-356.)

Some time after the revenue agents appeared at the corporation's office in the summer of 1948, Cain twice directed Gratlund to destroy the corporation's informal record of Lubben's over-the-ceiling cash payments for a part of the period in question, and his orders were eventually carried out. (R. 785, 1743-1745.) In August 1948, Cain had a conversation with Lubben and the latter's attorney, Davidson, during which he told them that internal revenue agents had visited the Shotwell plant; that Gratlund "like a damn fool" had given them records; and that the agents were working on tax cases involving Lubben, Lub-ben's former partner William Giglio, and the Shotwell personnel. In August 1948, Cain offered Lubben financial assistance and urged him to leave the country to avoid questioning by the agents. He indicated to Lubben at the time that he was attempting to settle the case through political pressure. (R. 962–974.)

Respondents' defense on the merits was that the total of the over-ceiling payments received from Lubben was much smaller than the amount shown by the prosecution's evidence; that the corporation received the over-ceiling payments from Lubben only from September 1945 to the middle of 1946; and that all the black market receipts had been paid out to obtain raw materials. (R. 2540–2631, 2631–2686.) Cain testified that the purchases by the corporation of raw materials with black market receipts were handled by employees. (R. 262–266, 2577, 2579, 2580, 2583.) He admitted that the figures appearing in Busby's summary purporting to reflect purchases of raw materials with the black market receipts were meaningless "plug" figures. (R. 216–217, 233–234, 258–268.) He also admitted that he never made any effort to find out to whom the money was paid, and that he repeatedly told the revenue agents that he did not want to know to whom the money had been paid. (R. 266, 268.) For his part, Sullivan testified that he never saw any of the black market receipts; that he never received any of the money himself; and that he had no "actual" knowledge of the alleged purchases and knew only what he had been told by others. (R. 2638, 2645, 2650, 2654, 2671.)

FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS OF THE TRIAL COURT

As previously noted, supra, p. 8, the trial court (Judge Nordbye) denied the motion to suppress evidence at the close of the hearing with the observation that it would be inappropriate for the court to express its views prior to trial on the credibility of the witnesses and the good faith of respondents. After the verdict, the court filed a Memorandum Decision (R. 3242-3247) setting forth its findings of fact and conclusions of law in which it held that (R. 3247) "the [respondents] have failed to sustain the burden of proof in establishing that a voluntary disclosure was made by them within the purview of the so-called voluntary disclosure doctrine." Having concluded that no good faith disclosure was made by respondents, the trial court did not find it necessary to make a finding as to the timeliness of the alleged disclosure.

The trial court found as a fact that the so-called disclosure made by respondents was not only devoid of good faith but that respondents, by their "[f]alse statements and fraudulent representations" to Government agents in the guise of a voluntary disclosure, had actually attempted to deceive the Government and to conceal the true facts. (R. 3247.) In so finding, the court pointed to Cain's conduct in "accepting Mr. Lubben's figures of the total amount of overages paid to Shotwell and then fabricating fictitious payments for raw material to offset such receipts" (R. 3245); to the evidence that records "which would be illuminating and helpful in determining the true situation" with respect to the black market transactions had been destroyed at Cain's direction after the agents began their investigation (R. 3245); to the fact that the figures submitted to the investigating agents which purported to represent expenditures by the corporation for black market purchases "were admittedly fictitious and submitted solely for the purpose of indicating that premium receipts were completely wiped out by the premium payments" (R. 3246); and to the absence of any bona fide attempt by respondents "to determine the amount and the persons to whom any premium payments were made for raw materials" (R. 3245–3246). With respect to this last consideration, the court noted (R. 3246) that throughout the course of the investigation Cain took the position that he would not under any circumstances disclose to whom the payments were made for the alleged black market purchases of raw materials by the corporation and thus "attempted to foreclose any investigation by the Government as to the verity of the claim of such payments."[11]

[11] The trial court also found that the factual situation disclosed to Sauber by Busby and Cain was that (R. 3244) "there were unreported receipts obtained by the Shotwell Company in black market operations which were completely offset by unreported deductions [expenditures] for raw materials". This finding, coupled with Cain's assertions that he had assumed in good faith that expenditures for black market purchases were deductible (and the transactions a wash-out taxwise) and that he was unaware of the Treasury Department's ruling to the contrary until so advised by Busby, led the court to conclude (R. 3244) that here "[t]here was no disclosure of an intentional tax violation or * * * of an intent to defraud the Government". In other words if the representations made by Cain and Busby were true there was (R. 3245) "no disclosure of anything on which these [respondents] could be prosecuted."

Finally, the trial court found as facts that (R. 3246) "no promise of immunity was held out to these [respondents], or any of them, by any representative of the Government when these alleged disclosures were made, or at any other time"; and that "there were no representations by any Government representative which would lead these defendants to believe that the alleged disclosure would be considered a voluntary disclosure within the purview of the voluntary disclosure doctrine."

In interpreting the various public pronouncements of Treasury Department officials on the voluntary disclosure policy, the trial court ruled as a matter of law that (R. 3245)—

> The doctrine necessarily contemplates a contrite taxpayer who confesses his fraud and evidences good faith in aiding and assisting the Government in obtaining the payment of the taxes due.

In the trial court's view (R. 3245), the "basic element of a voluntary disclosure within the enunciated Government policy" is good faith on the part of the taxpayer. That element it found was entirely lacking here. The court noted that (R. 3246) "the evidence convincingly established," as the jury found, that a large part of the black market receipts was never paid out for the purchase of raw materials, as respondents had represented. The court further observed (R. 3247):

> What a travesty it would be if, under such circumstances, immunity should be granted to the defendants because of the alleged disclosure which had only one purpose and that was to mislead and to misinform the Government agents of the true facts. False statements and fraudulent representations made to Government agents under the pretense of a voluntary disclosure can never constitute the basis for immunity from criminal prosecution under any possible interpretation of the so-called voluntary disclosure doctrine.

III

THE DECISION BELOW

The court below, with Judge Lindley dissenting, reversed the judgments of conviction on the ground that the trial court erred in denying respondents' motion to suppress evidence, and it remanded the case for a new trial with instructions to sustain repondents' motion. (R. 3361–3364.) The majority held (R. 3354) that respondents made a "valid voluntary disclosure"; that they did so "in reliance upon promises of immunity"; that the evidence thus obtained by the Government stands on the same footing as an oral or written confession induced by such a promise; and that the use of such evidence at the trial was a violation of respondents' privilege against self-incrimination as guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution. Thus, the court below found that respondents "did disclose the facts" (R. 3351); that they "frankly outlined" the nature of the omissions from the returns (R. 3352); and that they "cooperated [with Treasury agents] to the extent that they were able, and in complete compliance with the [voluntary disclosure] policy of the department" (R.

3351). Further, the court held that the disclosure was "accepted by the revenue officials" as a voluntary disclosure within the announced policy of the Treasury Department (R. 3352–3353); that at all material times respondents "were led to believe by the Government representatives that the course which they were pursuing would avert their criminal prosecution" (R. 3352); and that "responsible government officials, from cabinet level to local level, had represented to [respondents] that their disclosure would result in immunity from criminal prosecution" (R. 3352–3353). On the basis of these findings, the majority concluded that (R. 3354) "[respondents] made a valid voluntary disclosure in reliance upon promises of immunity".

The dissent by Judge Lindley (R. 3356–3358) was based mainly on the ground that the majority, in holding that respondents made a valid voluntary disclosure, embarked on a trial de novo of the factual issues raised by the motion rather than according the requisite weight to the trial court's findings of fact which, in Judge Lindley's opinion, were "amply supported" by the evidence and therefore unassailable on review.[11] Thus, although the majority prefaced its summary of the evidentiary facts (R. 3343) with the comment that (R. 3343) "[t]he following is a statement of the facts proved, including only those facts shown by the government's evidence wherever there was a conflict." Judge Lindley noted that the majority's summary of evidentiary facts (R. 3359) "tells only a part of the story on which the trial court's findings are based". Judge Lindley pointed out (R. 3359), specifically, that the majority failed to mention the fact that Sauber was not advised by respondents that, in addition to the black-market receipts, there were other wholly unrecorded sales by the corporation (the "unbilled shipments", see pp. 10-11, supra); that the only records made by the corporation reflecting black market transactions were destroyed at Cain's direction after the investigation was started;[15] and that the summaries which respondents submitted to the agents purporting to show expenditures by the corporation for the purchase of raw materials on the black market were admittedly fictitious; with respondents maintaining that hundreds of thousands of dollars were paid out by the corporation to unidentified men without the benefit of any receipts. He stated that the majority also ignored the trial court's finding that the respondents' account of black market expenditures was, in large part, a fabrication and that the only purpose of their disclosure was to mislead the Government and conceal the true facts. These and the other critical findings of the trial court were, in Judge

[11] Judge Lindley also took issue with the majority for rejecting the trial court's interpretation of the Treasury Department's voluntary disclosure policy while at the same time failing (R. 3355) "to define clearly its interpretation of the * * * policy." He expressed the conviction that (R. 3360) "the [trial] court's interpretation of the * * * [policy] as requiring such a complete disclosure and good faith effort as to enable the internal revenue agents to assess the additional tax due is a correct interpretation of the offer held out to taxpayers in the Treasury policy statements."

Lindley's opinion (R. 3360), "adequately supported by the evidence". Accordingly, he concluded (R. 3360) that it was not within the "province [of the reviewing court] to second-guess the trial court on factual questions." Judge Lindley's dissent was summed up in his observation that (R. 3359):

> The point to be stressed is that on the record before us we cannot say that the evidence does not support the finding of the trial court that no sufficient disclosure was made. We cannot say that the court's conclusion that "False statements and fraudulent representations made to Government agents under the pretense of a voluntary disclosure can never constitute the basis for immunity from criminal prosecution under any possible interpretation of the so-called voluntary disclosure doctrine" is an erroneous legal statement or that the hypothecated facts included in this statement are not descriptive of the proofs made in this case.

In addition to finding that respondents made a bona fide disclosure, the majority below also found (R. 3354) that "[t]he disclosure was timely." In so doing, the majority observed that (R. 3353–54) "the facts in evidence show that when the disclosure was made, no investigation involving the over-ceiling income of Shotwell during the taxable years had been started or even suggested or contemplated by the government." As previously noted, supra, p. 18, Judge Nordbye had specifically refrained from making a finding as to the timeliness of the disclosure.

IV

THE NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE

As set forth in the supplement to the Government's motion to remand (p. 3), subsequent to the filing of the petition for certiorari, and as a result of an investigation initiated by the National Office of the Internal Revenue Service which precipitated a grand jury inquiry,[16] new evidence came to light which is highly relevant to the issues of the timeliness and good faith of respondents' "voluntary disclosure". The Government believes that this evidence will support the charge[17] that perjured testimony with reference to the so-called disclosure was given at the trial of these proceedings by respondents Cain and Sullivan. This evidence indicates, inter alia, that no move was made by respondents to disclose the corporation's unreported black market receipts prior to Special Agent Krane's visit to the corporation's plant on June 21, 1948. (See p. 16, supra.) Further, this evidence, we submit, conclusively shows that the alleged disclosure by respondents was not only devoid of good faith and incomplete but was designed to mislead the Government and conceal the true facts.

[16] Certain aspects of this case have been investigated by The April 1956 Term Grand Jury for the Northern District of Illinois which returned the indictment referred to hereinafter.

[17] On February 27, 1957, an indictment was returned in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois charging, among other things, that Cain and Sullivan gave perjured testimony at the trial of this case. United States v. Sullivan, et al., No. 57 CR 149. See fn. 23, pp. 30–31, infra.

While the Government's petition and the respondents' cross-petition for certiorari were pending, respondent Huebner[18] and others voluntarily came forward with new evidence which relates to both the timeliness and the good faith of the respondents' alleged disclosure.

As previously noted, supra, p. 12, it was Busby's testimony that he first learned of the corporation's unreported black market receipts in the course of conversation with Gratlund during their trip to New York early in January 1948; that immediately upon his return to Chicago he discussed the matter with Cain and Sullivan who told him the unreported receipts were washed out by unreported expenditures for raw materials; that he recommended disclosing the omissions to the Treasury Department; and that, at the direction of Cain and Sullivan, he disclosed the whole affair to Sauber in a series of conferences beginning in the latter part of January 1948, at one or more of which conferences he was accompanied by Cain. He also testified that Sauber suggested that respondents gather together and summarize all available data on the black market transactions for submission to the agents who would investigate the returns; and that he and his staff, with the assistance of Gratlund, Huebner and Cain, immediately began a long investigation in order to assemble the data summarized in the respondents' tentative computation of unreported black market receipts and expenditures introduced at the suppression hearing and later at the trial. Cain and Sauber gave similar testimony, except that Sauber fixed the time of Busby's first visit at about the middle of March 1948. Respondents recognize that the only evidence as to the date of the alleged disclosure is the testimony of Cain, Busby and Sauber.[19] (Respondents' Answer to Motion (Amended) To Remand 2-3.)

If this case is remanded to the trial court, Grafflund will testify[20] that he did not discuss the black market transactions with Busby on the trip to New York, and that it was not until a few days after Agent Krane's initial visit to the plant in June 1948, that he related to Busby what he knew about the black market dealings, at which time Busby displayed surprise and complete ignorance of these transactions. Furthermore both Grafflund and Huebner will testify that they did not assist Cain, Busby or any member of the latter's staff in assembling data relative to the black market transactions at any time prior to Agent Krane's visit to the plant,[21] and that the black market payments received from Lubben in fact were reconstructed at a meeting held in the middle of July 1948. In addition, Huebner and Grafflund will testify that, although they were summoned to a meeting at Cain's [19] It appears evident from Judge Nordbye's memorandum (R. 3242 17) that he found Cain's testimony, at least in part, unworthy of belief.

[20] See Affidavit of H. Stanley Grafflund, lodged with the Clerk of this Court, Aug. 19, 1957; other aspects of the newly discovered evidence are outlined in the affidavits attached to the Motion to Remand (Amended), Appendix, pp. 7-23.

[21] Busby testified that Huebner and Grafflund were two of the principal people who assisted in this work. (R. 182, 185.)

house early in July 1948 to discuss the implications of Special Agent Krane's visit to the plant requesting records relating to the corporation's transactions with Lubben, there was nothing said at the meeting about a voluntary disclosure having been made months earlier. Moreover, Huebner and Graflund will testify that at no time prior to the middle of July 1948 were they ever advised or led to believe by either Cain or Sullivan that the corporation's unreported black market receipts had been disclosed to the Treasury Department. Huebner's affidavit (Supplement To Motion To Remand, App. 7–10) relates, and he will testify, that it was not until late July or early August 1948 that Cain first mentioned to him that a voluntary disclosure had been made to Sauber, at which time he was told by Cain that June 15 had been agreed upon as the date of the disclosure. Also, that during the suppression hearing, after he had heard Sauber testify, he said to Cain (id. at p. 10) "I thought the voluntary disclosure date was supposed to be June 15, 1948"; whereupon Cain replied "Ssshhh. There is nobody that knows anything about this. Keep quiet."

As previously noted, supra, pp. 10–11, at the trial the prosecution's evidence showed that in 1945 and continuing through 1946, the corporation received more than $450,000 in unreported income from Lubben.[22] Cain, on the other hand, testified that the total of the black market receipts from Lubben was only about a third of the amount shown by the Government's evidence; that the premium payments were received for only a limited period—the latter part of 1945 through the middle of 1946; and that substantially all of these receipts were paid out by the corporation to unidentified men for the purchase of raw materials. Huebner states in his affidavit and will now testify that (Supplement To Motion To Remand, App. 7–8):

[22] Respondents admitted, at least tentatively, the receipt of almost $400,000 in unreported income from Lubben during the years 1944, 1945 and 1946 when they submitted the summary, referred to herein as Busby's summary, to Revenue Agent Lima sometime after July 30, 1948. This schedule was introduced in evidence at the hearing on the motion (R. 189) as Def. Ex. 1

> I know; from my own knowledge, that over-ceiling premium payments in currency were received by Shotwell from David G. Lubben during the period from November, 1944, to sometime in December, 1946, that none of these payments were recorded on Shotwell's books and that Cain and Sullivan were aware of these facts as they occurred. Cain and Sullivan testified that these payments were received only during the period beginning in the late summer of 1945 and ending in July, 1946. I know of my own knowledge that this testimony was untrue.

Furthermore, Huebner will testify that between $300,000 and $400,000 of the corporation's black market receipts from Lubben was not paid out for the purchase of raw materials on the black market but instead was diverted from the corporation and divided among Cain, Sullivan and himself.

Further, Huebner and Grafund will testify that Cain told them in the latter part of July 1948, before (reproduced in the record at pp. 3091–3096) and at the trial (R. 2811) as Government Exs. 186 and 189.

Busby's summary had been submitted to any Internal Revenue Service personnel, that he could settle the tax case for about $20,000. Huebner will also testify that shortly thereafter Cain asked him for $10,000 in cash which Cain said he needed to "fix" the case; that in the last week of July, he gave Cain $5,000 in cash; that in the early part of August 1948, Cain told him that he had settled the case for a tax deficiency of $20,000; that shortly thereafter, he gave Cain the other $5,000 in cash; and that Cain told him he had turned the money over to someone to take care of the tax "fix". In this connection, Revenue Agent Lima will testify that on July 30, 1948, he was instructed by his Group Supervisor Johnson to make an immediate audit of the corporation's 1946 return, which audit he commenced the first week of August; that thereafter he was instructed by Johnson to allow over-ceiling purchases totaling more than $300,000 shown on Busby's summary, although the alleged purchases were wholly unsubstantiated and their allowance was contrary to the then policy of the Service; and that in accordance with Johnson's instructions, he prepared a revenue agent's report showing a tax deficiency for 1945 and 1946 of about $20,000, which report he destroyed at Johnson's direction in September 1948, after the Intelligence Unit of the Service had made inquiries about the case.

[fn. 17] This and other evidence in the Government's possession forms the basis for the indictment returned in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois on February 27, 1957, which, in addition to charging Cain and Sullivan with perjury (see fn. 17, p. 25, supra) charges that Sullivan, Cain, Busby, Sauber and John conspired to de-

The Government respectfully submits that this Court should, in the interests of justice, and in the exercise of its power under 28 U. S. C., Section 2106 (supra, p. 3),[21] vacate the judgments of the Court of Appeals and remand these proceedings to the trial court with directions to take further evidence and make supplementary findings on respondents' motion to suppress. The Government recognizes that its motion is unusual. We are, however, confronted here with unusual circumstances which require exceptional action to safeguard the integrity of the judicial process. These larger considerations prompted the Government to move this Court for a remand while at the same time reiterating its firm conviction that the evidence now of record is more than adequate to support the trial court's findings of fact.

As the chronological statement of the history of this litigation indicates (Appendix, infra, pp. 40-46), the Government has acted diligently in response to the new facts uncovered by the Internal Revenue Service investigation subsequent to the trial on the merits and the filing of the petition for certiorari. As the chronology further discloses, except to the extent that it has been thwarted by the dilatory tactics of the respondents, the Government has endeavored to bring the true facts to light as promptly as possible. The newly discovered facts have a vital bearing on the issues presented by the motion to suppress and are such that, in the unusual circumstances of this case, a remand to the district court is warranted.

I

THE NEW EVIDENCE HAS A VITAL BEARING ON THE ISSUES PRESENTED BY THE MOTION TO SUPPRESS

The new evidence summarized above, at pages 25–30, indicates that perjured testimony, all of which was designed to aid the respondents, was given at the suppression hearing by respondent Cain, by Busby, as a defense witness, and by Sauber, as a Government witness, and at the trial by respondents Cain and Sullivan and by Busby both as a defense and a Government witness. The new evidence points to the conclusion that what respondents seek to characterize as a timely voluntary disclosure was in truth no disclosure at all but a further step in a conspiracy to defraud the United States and to defeat and evade taxes.

Respondents' motion to suppress was predicated on the theory that there had been a valid voluntary disclosure which, under the then policy of the Treasury Department (see supra, pp. 5–6), estopped the Government from instituting and maintaining these proceedings (R. 10–13). But two elements must be present before an accused can invoke this policy:—(1) the disclosure must be timely, i. e., it must take place, as the Court of Appeals stated (R. 3351), before "the revenue agents get the scent and are in pursuit of the miscreant", and (2) it must be a full, good-faith and voluntary disclosure of the operative facts which give rise to the additional liability of the taxpayer. The trial judge found that there had been no good-faith disclosure and explicitly refrained from making "any finding as to the exact date when the Government first commenced its investigation of the Shotwell Company's income taxes for the years in question" (R. 3247). As we have seen, the Court of Appeals, in reversing, not only substituted its findings and held that there was a "good faith disclosure, but made an affirmative finding that the disclosure was timely." (R. 3354.) The newly discovered evidence goes to the heart of both issues, i. e., timeliness and good faith, and, we submit, conclusively shows that both are absent here.

The new evidence indicates that the testimony which placed the date of the so-called disclosure in January or March 1948 was perjurious testimony of respondents and of Busby and Sauber.[26] In fact, the so-called disclosure took place in July 1948.[27] This was subsequent to the occasion (on June 21, 1948) when Special Agent Krane called at the corporation office and requested, inter alia, records relating to transactions with Lubben. See p. 16, supra.

The significance of this new evidence is readily apparent. Not only has there been no finding as to timeliness by the proper fact-finding tribunal, but the [26] We urged in our Petition for Certiorari (pp. 23-24) that the case should at least have been remanded by the Court of Appeals to permit the court of first instance to pass upon this crucial issue, and we adhere to the position that, apart from the newly discovered evidence, this would have been the proper procedure. We urge that, in the light of the new evidence, remand to the district court is a fortiori warranted.

[27] See fn. 17, infra, p. 25.

[27] The new evidence does not merely impeach testimony as to the time of the alleged disclosure but affirmatively shows that it did not take place until this later date.

Court of Appeals, which erroneously undertook to make a finding on this issue, did so on the basis of a record now shown to have been tainted by the respondents and their co-conspirators. A finding based on a record so corrupted cannot be permitted to stand.

Respondents contend that the so-called 'disclosure would have been timely even if made in July. (Answer to Motion (Amended) to Remand (hereafter referred to as "Answer") 4–7, 19–24.) They predicate this contention on the assertion that no investigation directed specifically at respondents had been initiated by July 1948, and that under the so-called Wenchel doctrine (see Answer 20–21) taxpayers could avail themselves of the voluntary disclosure policy until such an investigation was formally launched. We submit, however, that this is not the proper forum to pass, in the first instance, on this and other aspects of the "timeliness" issue. It is for the trial court, not this Court, to determine what the exact stage of the Government's investigation was as of July 1948, and further, whether an investigation which had proceeded thus far served to end the locus poenitentiae afforded taxpayers under the voluntary disclosure policy. These are matters into which the district court may fully inquire on remand after hearing the newly discovered evidence, discounting such of the testimony previously adduced as may be found by it to have been perjurious.

Since respondents had the burden of proof on the motion to suppress, the Government would clearly prevail if no more were to occur on the remand than the striking from the record of the testimony as to the time of disclosure if it is found to have been perjurious. However, since the district court has never passed on the question of timeliness, and no tribunal has considered this issue on a record cleansed of perjury and amplified by the newly discovered matters, we urge that the case be remanded to the district court for a full hearing enabling the parties to present any new evidence on the timeliness of the alleged voluntary disclosure.

With respect to the nature and good faith of the alleged disclosure, apart from the question of when it was made, the influence of the perjurious testimony on the result reached by the Court of Appeals appears clear. In reversing the district court, the Court of Appeals substituted its findings of fact which of necessity were predicated on the record as it then stood, devoid of the newly discovered facts which we have summarized supra, at pp. 25-30. In view of the extensive development of the facts in the statement above, we do not believe that the point need be labored that the new evidence has a direct and vital bearing on the question whether there has ever been a full good-faith voluntary disclosure. The evidence which the Government offers to present on remand would rather show that respondents, believing that their case had been successfully "fixed" (see pp. 29-30, supra), went through the mechanics of a disclosure which was really

[*] In fact, the newly discovered evidence supports the conclusion that the question of timeliness discussed supra is not actually presented by this case, since it appears that there has at no time been any disclosure which would satisfy any reasonable interpretation of the voluntary disclosure policy.

but a further step in a scheme to defraud the Government and which actually concealed the corporation's true tax liability.

It would be contrary to the interests of justice to permit the opinion of the Court of Appeals, misled by respondents' perjurious testimony, to stand uncorrected. Rather, this case should be remanded for a further hearing to the district court so that there may be a full inquiry into the circumstances of the alleged disclosure, its extent, timeliness, and good faith. Of course, if after such a hearing the district court should adhere to its denial of the motion to suppress, respondents may again bring the matter to the Court of Appeals which can then pass upon the matter in the light of a full record, amplified by the new evidence and cleansed of the taint of perjury.

II

IN VIEW OF THE UNUSUAL CIRCUMSTANCES OF THIS CASE, THE MOTION TO REMAND SHOULD BE GRANTED

Contrary to respondents' assertion (Answer 13–16), the Government is not seeking a new trial, and authorities with respect to the granting of retrials on the grounds of newly discovered evidence have no application here. The considerations which are relevant when a defendant seeks to have a verdict set aside because of new evidence tending to negate guilt are entirely inapposite here. In this case, the newly discovered evidence supports the conviction—which was set aside by the Court of Appeals—and all of the perjury adduced below was in support of a defense contention which was accepted by the Court of Appeals.

A real concern in the usual new evidence case is whether granting a retrial would, in effect, vest the power to set aside the conviction, not in the court, but in those proffering the evidence. For example, the courts consider whether such action would enable and encourage defendants to join with prosecution witnesses in automatically setting aside a conviction by producing a "recantation". See People v. Shilitano, 218 N. Y. 161, 168. No such considerations obtain where, as here, the newly discovered evidence serves to preserve rather than vitiate the verdict of the jury.

Moreover, this is clearly not a case where one party, having failed to convince a court of the soundness of his position, seeks a remand merely to bolster his case by additional evidence. Rather, what the Government in essence seeks here is an opportunity to have excised from the record respondents' perjury. As noted supra at pp. 34–35, if no more than this took place on remand, the Government would prevail. Put, if the Court of Appeals decision reversing the conviction and remanding with instructions to grant the motion to suppress is not vacated, respondents' perjury will have achieved its desired effect.

Obviously respondents should not be allowed to profit from their perjury. It is in the best interests of justice, after a full development of the facts by the proper tribunal, to place the respondents, as near as may be, in the position which they would have occupied had there been no perjury. Therefore, the conviction obtained not because of, but despite, the perjury, should not be set aside unless the record, cleansed of the perjury, cannot support the conviction. The sole basis for the reversal of the conviction was the conclusion of the Court of Appeals that the motion to suppress should have been granted. If the newly discovered evidence demonstrates that the trial judge's ruling was in fact a correct one, it is apparent that nothing was presented to the jury by the Government which would mar the verdict and there is no need for the new trial ordered by the Court of Appeals."

The facts and circumstances of this case make apposite the observation of this Court in Communist Party v. Subversive Activities Control Board, 351 U. S. 115, 124, reiterated in Mesarosh v. United States, 352 U. S. 1, 14, that:

> The untainted administration of justice is certainly one of the most cherished aspects of our institutions. Its observance is one of our proudest boasts. This Court is charged with supervisory functions in relation to proceedings in the federal courts. See McNabb v. United States, 318 U. S. 332. Therefore, fastidious regard for the honor of the administration of justice requires the Court to make certain that the doings of justice be made so manifest that only irrational or perverse claims of its disregard can be asserted.

[20] "The issues of fact and law raised by the alleged voluntary disclosure, in so far as they related to the respondents' motions to dismiss the indictment and suppress the evidence obtained from such alleged disclosure, were decided solely by the trial judge after a pre-trial hearing. (See Petition for Certiorari, 6–7.) These issues, and the evidence bearing on them, were not submitted to the jury, except that the jury was allowed to consider the evidence as to the alleged disclosure in so far as it threw light upon the issue of wilfulness as an element of the substantive offense, i. e., the defendants' "intent" and "good faith" (R. 2968–2970).

Where, as here, all of the perjury related to a defense contention and striking such testimony would not in any wise weaken the Government's case, it is submitted that "the untainted administration of justice" would appear to require a remand of this case to the trial court rather than a new trial. Such remand of course would preserve to the parties the right to seek appellate review of the rulings of the district court, made upon the amplified record.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated, the Government respectfully submits that this Court should, in the interest of justice, vacate the judgments of the Court of Appeals and remand these proceedings to the trial court with instructions to take further evidence and make supplementary findings on respondents' preliminary motion to suppress. Ascertainment of where the whole truth lies with respect to the alleged disclosure is a function, we believe, for the trial court in the first instance. Cf. Remmer v. United States, 350 U. S. 377, 379-380; 347 U. S. 227.

No.

THE SHOTWELL MANUFACTURING COMPANY, BYRON A. CAIN, FRANK J. HUEBNER AND HAROLD E. SULLIVAN, Cross-Petitioners,

vs.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

Respondent.

CONDITIONAL CROSS-PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

Petitioners pray that if this Court grants the petition for a writ of certiorari prayed by the Solicitor General in No. 470, this term, and opposed by petitioners, that writs also issue on this cross-petition to review the judgments[1] of the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit entered in these causes on June 15, 1955, so that petitioners' motion for dismissal, ruled on by the Court of Appeals adversely to petitioners, may be before this Court.

1. There was a joint indictment in the District Court but several judgments of conviction. Several appeals were taken to the Court of Appeals but were consolidated for disposition.

CITATIONS TO OPINIONS BELOW.

The oral opinions of the District Courts denying petitioners' motion to dismiss the indictment (which motion is the sole subject of this cross-petition) appear at R. pages 90 ff. and 617, and are printed as Appendix B.[2]

The opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals is not yet reported. It is printed in Appendix C.

JURISDICTION.

The judgment of the Court of Appeals was entered on June 15, 1955 (Appen. C). Rehearing, on the Government's application therefor, was denied on August 18, 1955 (Appen. D). On September 16, 1955, Justice Reed granted an application by the Solicitor General to extend the time of the United States for filing a petition for certiorari to and including October 17, 1955, and granted a conditional application by these petitioners extending their time to the same date, "provided the time has not already expired." Jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U. S. C. Sec. 1254(1).

QUESTION PRESENTED.

Whether judicially enforceable immunity from criminal prosecution results from acceptance of public offers of such immunity to those who would voluntarily disclose irregularities in their income tax returns where the offers were made by Secretaries and other Treasury officials authorized by Section 3761 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939 (26 U. S. C., 1952 Ed., 145), to effect compromise, before indictment, of any criminal case arising under the Internal Revenue laws?

2. Record references herein are to the Record filed in No. 470, this term.

SUBSIDIARY QUESTION PRESENTED.

In a criminal case decided in a Court of Appeals in defendants' favor and in which the Government files a petition for rehearing tolling its time to petition for certiorari, is defendants' time for filing a cross-petition similarly tolled?

STATUTE INVOLVED.

The statutory provision involved is Section 3761 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939 (26 U. S. C., 1952 Ed., 145), printed as Appendix A.

STATEMENT.

Petitioners were jointly indicted for allegedly wilfully and knowingly attempting to evade a portion of the corporate income taxes allegedly owing by petitioner The Shotwell Manufacturing Company for 1945 and 1946 (R. 5). They were convicted in the District Court. Upon appeal the Court of Appeals reversed and remanded for a new trial, holding that evidence must be suppressed which had been supplied by petitioners in reliance on the Government's "voluntary disclosure" policy, which promised immunity to those who, before investigation was commenced, voluntarily disclosed tax irregularities.

In the trial court, petitioners had moved (R. 10, 612) to dismiss the indictment on the ground that they voluntarily disclosed the irregularities complained of to the District Collector and Treasury Agents, and supplied full data relevant to a proper assessment of the tax under the rules then being applied by the Treasury Department; that this disclosure was made in reliance upon the "voluntary disclosure" policy promulgated and publicly declared by Secretaries of the Treasury and Commissioners of Internal Revenue which promised and represented that there would be no criminal prosecution where a voluntary disclosure of misstatement or omission in a tax return was made to a responsible officer of the Treasury Department before investigation had been initiated.

The prosecutor did not traverse the facts averred by this motion, which was the equivalent of the former plea in bar, but demurred to it.[3] The District Court (Judge Barnes) upheld the demurrer on the ground that although statutes permitting the compromising of tax liabilities are doubtless wise, that estoppels against the Government may not arise out of what he termed "negotiations looking toward compromise under the statute" (R. 97). The matter was subsequently presented to District Judge Nordbye, who ruled that the question had been exhausted before Judge Barnes (R. 617).

The case went to trial on the merits and the prosecutor was permitted to introduce much evidence made available to, or specially compiled for, the Government during the disclosure process.

3. That the facts averred in the motion to dismiss were not a sham and could be proved by competent evidence is established by the Court of Appeals' finding on the motion to suppress (which averred similar facts and on which evidence was taken), that (a) the "voluntary disclosure policy" did exist, and (b) that petitioners complied with it.

If the prosecutor had filed a replication raising factual issues as to the motion to dismiss, petitioners would have been entitled to a jury trial, before a separate jury and in advance of any trial on the merits, on such issues. This is because Rule 12(a) of the Criminal Rules provides that a defense formerly raised before trial by plea shall now be raised by motion. The defense raised by the motion to dismiss formerly would have been raised by a plea in bar of the action and separately tried. (Short v. U. S., 4 Cir., 91 F. 2d 614, 619; Commonwealth v. Merrill, 90 Mass. 545.) This, we believe, would be the result if this Court directed that the demurrer to the motion be overruled and if the prosecutor should thereafter file a factual replication to it.

The Court of Appeals did not pass upon the "merits" of the appeal but held

> (a) that petitioners made a valid voluntary disclosure in compliance with the Treasury's offers therefor,
>
> (b) that the immunity promised by the Treasury could not be enforced judicially because "there was no statutory basis for the alleged promises of immunity announced by the various Treasury Department officials" but,
>
> (c) that the pre-trial motion to suppress evidence surrendered in reliance on the dishonored promises should have been sustained, and
> (d) remanded the case for a new trial without passing on other questions raised as to the conduct of the trial or sufficiency of the evidence.

The "voluntary disclosure" policy, on which the questions presented by this, and the Government's petition hinge, was first promulgated by the Treasury on August 22, 1919. It existed in varying forms until January 10, 1952, when it was withdrawn by Secretary Snyder. It has not since been in force. Official explanations were given to Congress for the withdrawal. (See Hearings of a Subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, 82nd Cong., 2nd Session, January 22, 23, 24 and 25, 1952, excerpts from which appear at R. 3106-3153.)

In 1945 and the immediately following years the Treasury gave the policy widespread publicity in a drive to collect taxes on "black market" profits, many millions of which it was feared would not be discovered through ordinary processes of investigation. Relevant, definitive excerpts from Treasury bulletins and public pronouncements offering and promising immunity from prosecution to those who would voluntarily disclose are printed as Appendix E.

THIS CROSS-PETITION IS TIMELY.

It is well established that a timely petition for rehearing tolls the running of the time within which certiorari must be applied for because it operates to suspend the finality of the lower court's judgment (Department of Banking v. Pink, 317 U. S. 264). When the Government's petition for rehearing was filed in the Court of Appeals here it operated to suspend the finality of the judgment and to open the door for a possible complete revision of its views by the Court of Appeals and the ultimate entry of a judgment affirming the convictions below or otherwise greatly altering the initial adjudication.

We have found no decision of this Court passing upon the issue stated as a subsidiary question here. However, the precise question came up in Texas & P. R. R. Co. v. Perkins (Tex. Comm. of Appeals), 48 S. W. 2d 249, and in Meda v. Lawton, 214 Cal. 588, 7 P. 2d 180. Both of the state tribunals involved, operating under appellate procedure akin to Federal certiorari procedure, held that a petition for rehearing by one party tolled the running of the time for all.

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT.

In our answer to the Government's petition we shall point out why it would be inappropriate for this Court to grant review as the matter now stands. However, if the Court should conclude to grant the Solicitor General's petition, then we submit that this petition also should be granted so that there may be no doubt that both consequential issues, arising from the immunity promises, i.e., enforcement of the promise of immunity and suppression of evidence obtained by means of the promise, may be presented here at the same time.

It is our contention (a) that a contract, for immunity was created by acceptance of the Treasury's offers for voluntary disclosures and that dismissal of the criminal proceedings rather than mere suppression of evidence obtained by means of the promise is the proper remedy for breach of the Treasury's promise, and (b) that the contract is either completely valid, or sufficiently valid to raise an estoppel, even though the formal record of it directed to be made by subsection (b) of the compromise statute was not made.

I.

It well may be that the question as presented by the Government's petition will be sufficiently broad under Rule 23 1(c) to include the remedial point which we urge. However, as of this writing we do not know how the Government will pose its question; and since it is true that a decision by this Court that petitioners' motion to dismiss stated a valid plea in bar would not be an affirmance of the Court of Appeals' judgment, this cross-petition is presented out of an abundance of caution. If the Court should decide to grant the Government's petition, which necessarily will pose the question as to whether the facts constitute compliance with the voluntary disclosure policy, or, more accurately stated, constitute acceptance of the Treasury's offers, it also should determine the full legal consequences of such compliance or acceptance, in so far as questions in that regard were raised below.

II.

Whether Section 3761 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939 authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, and certain others, to "compromise," before indictment, "any * * * criminal case arising under the revenue laws," authorizes him to promise immunity to those who would voluntarily disclose tax irregularities before the Government commenced investigation, is an important question of federal statutory construction which should be passed on by this Court if it determines to review the correctness of the Court of Appeals' decision that a valid disclosure was made in this case.

Moreover, that question involves standards of governmental morality at the highest level of the Executive Department.

The Court of Appeals opinion, by seeking to shrink the promises of immunity publicly and repeatedly made by Secretaries of the Treasury, to the ad hoc, and unenforceable, promises of immunity sometimes made by public prosecutors (Cf. Whiskey Cases, 99 U. S. 594, cited in the opinion below), skirts this disturbing moral question without coming to grips with it. The situations are far different—while a prosecutor may have discretion as to what cases to prosecute, he is given no authority by Congress to make binding compromises of criminal cases, whereas the Secretary of the Treasury, and certain others, plainly are given such authority by Section 3761.

And "compromise," in a purely criminal case, neither involving nor anticipating any reduction of the civil tax liability, necessarily embraces "immunity" because before indictment that is all the Government has to give.

Nor does the Court of Appeals' reliance upon the Second Court of Appeals' decision in U. S. v. Lustig, 163 F. 2d 85, answer the question. In the latter case the Second Court held, inter alia that Section 3761 afforded no shield to a prosecution "unless there has actually been a compromise. * * * None of the formalities prescribed by the statute and treated by the Supreme Court as necessary to effect a compromise were observed. Botany Worsted Mills v. United States, * * *, 278 U. S. at pages 288-289." The sine qua non of a binding compromise under that view would be the memorandum described in subsection (b) of the statute. The trouble is that this Court did not hold in the Botany case that observance of the "formalities" of Section (b) of the statute was mandatory. To the contrary, it held that to be valid a compromise (there civil) must be made by an official authorized by subsection (a) to make it. It left undecided the question as to whether the "record" making formalities of subsection (b) were required in all cases and recognized that a binding compromise, or "estoppel," might be created if an individual authorized by subsection (a) of the statute in fact made the compromise but failed to comply with subsection (b).

Subsequent to the Botany decision (and apparently unrealized by the Second Court of Appeals when it decided Lustig), it has been held uniformly that subsection (b) is directory, and not mandatory, and that failure of the Secretary to comply therewith will not invalidate an otherwise valid compromise. (Backus v. U. S. (C. C.), 59 F. 2d 242; Schneider v. U. S., 6 Cir., 119 F. 2d 215.)

Although the Government contended below, and the Court of Appeals held, that the Secretaries in promulgating and living by the "voluntary disclosure" policy did not do so under the compromise statute, no source of power to make, and to live by, such a policy, other than Section 3761, has yet been cited. In other words, the Department of Justice is contending that Secretaries Morgenthau, Snyder and Vinson made unauthorized and worthless promises to the public—that although they could have acted under the statute, they simply did not do so but chose to operate outside the law and to engage in a course of compounding felonies. A doctrine less flattering to the Secretaries, or more dangerous to the concept of limited, responsible and orderly government, is difficult to imagine.

III.

The holding in the case at bar that an enforceable contract of immunity (or an enforceable estoppel), cannot be created under the compromise statute short of literal compliance with the record-making requirements of its subsection (b) is not in harmony with the rationale of the Second Circuit in Rau v. U. S., 260 Fed. 131, the Fourth Circuit in Oliver v. U. S., 267 Fed. 544, and the Fifth Circuit in Willingham v. U. S., 208 Fed. 137.

Those cases were decided under Section 3229 of the Revised Statutes, the predecessor of Section 3761 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939. They involved alleged criminal violations of income, narcotics and whiskey tax laws respectively but did not involve the so-called disclosure policy. In all of them immunity was upheld on informal settlements. In each of them the compromise which the defendant asserted barred prosecution was made without technical compliance with the record-making requirements of Section (b) of the statute.

The present decision is likewise inconsistent with the decision of the Second Circuit in Lapides v. U. S., 215 F. 2d 253, in which Judge Frank, although speaking in a dissenting opinion, said that he and his colleagues were in agreement > "* * * that, if Lapides could have proved the alleged facts [a timely voluntary disclosure], he would have been entitled to the injunction he sought. For (a) the threat to break such a promise of immunity is a threat of unconstitutional conduct, * * *."

For the foregoing reasons this conditional cross-petition should be granted in the event the Government's petition in No. 470 is granted.

APPENDIX A.

"SEC. 3761. COMPROMISES.

(a) Authorization. The Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, or of the Under Secretary of the Treasury, or of an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, may compromise any civil or criminal case arising under the internal revenue laws prior to reference to the Department of Justice for prosecution or defense; and the Attorney General may compromise any such case after reference to the Department of Justice for prosecution or defense.

(b) Record. Whenever a compromise is made by the Commissioner in any case there shall be placed on file in the office of the Commissioner the opinion of the General Counsel for the Department of the Treasury, or of the officer acting as such, with his reasons therefor, with a statement of—

(1) The amount of tax assessed,

(2) The amount of additional tax or penalty imposed by law in consequence of the neglect or delinquency of the person against whom the tax is assessed, and

(3) The amount actually paid in accordance with the terms of the compromise."

APPENDIX B.

Excerpt from Oral Opinion of Judge Barnes (R. 97-8).

Concerning this point 3, counsel for the defendants, in one of the papers filed, states:

> "Point 3 asserts an estoppel in bar of the action by reason of a voluntary disclosure and thereby raises a question of first impression, although estoppels have been successfully invoked against the government in criminal cases on other grounds."

In argument, which I say was pressed with vigor, and very great ability as I thought, it was said that the statute providing for compromise gave authority to the officers of the Government to lay a basis for estoppel there having been disclosed to them facts which were not otherwise in the possession of the Government, the statute laid the basis for this estoppel. I have considered that argument over the week end, since it was made, and I have come to this conclusion:

There are statutes which permit compromising of tax liability. No doubt they are wise, but it is of no consequence to the court whether they are or not, they are there, and they are made by Congress. If there is any occasion for my expressing an opinion on them, I think I would say that they are a wise exercise of legislative power. But the question is: May estoppels against the government arise out of negotiations looking toward compromise under these statutes?

I have thought a good deal about that, and I have come to the conclusion that to permit estoppels to arise out of negotiations for compromise would simply destroy these statutes. If persons who for some reason or another, good, bad or indifferent, had failed to file proper returns, knew that what they did looking toward a compromise, the disclosure which they might make would give rise to an estopped, they would hesitate to make disclosures.

If governmental officials knew that if they sat down at a table and heard some more or less complete disclosures looking toward compromise they might subject the government to an estopped, it would have the same effect. An estopped resulting from an incompleted compromise might have a greater effect than a compromise. And neither side would take action looking toward the compromises which the government has said are beneficial to the United States.

I think the idea which I have attempted to voice is one excellent reason why incomplete—uncompleted negotiations for compromise should not be permitted to give rise to an estopped in favor of either side. Accordingly, I think the third point is not well taken.

Excerpt from Oral Opinion of Judge Nordbye (R. 617).

This additional motion to dismiss may be filed, but it must be denied. In that the parties have set forth their views in their correspondence to the Court, I see no necessity for any further hearing. First, it may be observed that the filing of this motion is not timely, and secondly the issues which defendants now desire to present in support of their motion have already been presented to the Court on two separate motions as indicated above and ruled upon adversely to the contentions of the defendants. The fact that the defendants now style their special plea in bar as one of pardon and amnesty does not enable them to present for rehearing the same issues as were presented to Judge Barnes. And in passing it may be noted that the defendants have taken the position before the Court that the issues presented on their motion to dismiss before Judge

Barnes and the undersigned were for the Court alone without a jury. Rule 12, Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, does not recognize any special plea in bar such as defendants now seek to present. It is the Court's view that the defendants have exhausted their rights on the grounds presented before the trial court, first, in moving to dismiss the indictment on the grounds urged before Judge Barnes, and secondly, on the motion to suppress the evidence before this Court. In any event, it would seem that the plea of pardon and amnesty is a matter for the executive or legislative department to consider and is not granted to any officials of the Internal Revenue Department by Title 26, U. S. C. A., § 3671, as defendants contend. The authority to compromise as granted in that statute is not a grant of amnesty.

IN THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS

October Term, 1954. April Session, 1955.
Nos. 11108-9-10-11.

Before LINDLEY, SWAIM and SCHNACKENBERG, Circuit Judges.

SCHNACKENBERG, Circuit Judge.

Shotwell Manufacturing Company, a corporation (sometimes herein referred to as Shotwell) and Byron A. Cain, Frank J. Huebner and Harold E. Sullivan, its officers, were indicted on two counts on March 14, 1952, for allegedly wilfully and knowingly attempting to defeat and evade a large part of the income taxes due and owing by Shotwell to the United States of America for the calendar years 1945 and 1946, in violation of section 145(b) of the Internal Revenue Code,[1] in that defendants filed and caused to be filed false and fraudulent tax returns for said corporation.

After trial on pleas of not guilty, the jury found all of the defendants guilty on both counts. Judgments of conviction were entered on the verdict, Shotwell was fined $10,000 on each count, the individual defendants were sentenced to three years' imprisonment on each count (to run concurrently). Cain was fined $5,000 on each count, Huebner was fined $5,000 on each count, and Sullivan was fined $2,500 on each count. The defendants have severally appealed.

The errors relied on arise out of the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict; the failure of the court to sustain defendants' motions to dismiss; the failure of the court to sustain motions to suppress documents and information prepared or furnished by defendants for the government during an alleged disclosure; certain rulings on evidence and instructions; and denial of motions for new trial.

1. The trial court was correct in denying defendants' two motions to dismiss the indictment, in the nature of special pleas in bar. These motions were based on the theory that defendants had acquired immunity from criminal prosecution by making a "voluntary disclosure", in reliance upon an announced policy of the Treasury Department not to prosecute in cases where such a disclosure had been made.

There was no statutory basis for the alleged promises of immunity announced by the various Treasury Department officials.[2] Thus the making of a voluntary disclosure by the defendants was no legal bar to a criminal prosecution. Only an act of Congress could create such immunity. In the absence of statute, a defendant cannot enforce such a promise and "cannot by law plead such facts in bar of any indictment against him, nor avail himself of it upon his trial, * * *" Whiskey Cases, 99 U. S. 594, 595, 25 L. Ed. 399, 400.

2. "At the outset, it is most important to point out that this policy of the Bureau of Internal Revenue not to recommend criminal prosecution where the taxpayer had made a voluntary disclosure before the investigation started, had no basis either in statute, rule or regulation." Balter, Fraud Under Federal Tax Law, Second Ed. 1935, p. 102.

Defendants contend, however, that there is a statutory basis for the voluntary disclosure policy in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise any civil or criminal case under § 3761 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939.[3] This same argument was squarely met and disposed of in U. S. v. Lustig, 163 F. 2d 85, 89[3a] where the court said:

> "The compromise statute[4] affords no shield to one who has violated the tax laws unless there has actually been a compromise. See Botany Worsted Mills v. United States, 278 U. S. 282, 49 S. Ct. 129, 73 L. Ed. 379. It is not even claimed here that there was more than an offer to make a compromise. None of the formalities prescribed by the statute and treated by the Supreme Court as necessary to effect a compromise were observed. Botany Worsted Mills v. United States, supra, 278 U. S. at pages 288-289, 49 S. Ct. 129, 73 L. Ed. 379. There was no issue of fact for court or jury as to whether a contract of compromise had been made. Accordingly there is no merit in the defense of immunity."

The language of the Lustig opinion is fully applicable to the case at bar. The Treasury Department officials did not have the power to confer immunity on persons making voluntary disclosures, defendants' voluntary disclosure was not a statutory compromise of a criminal case and did not entitle them to immunity, and the motions to dismiss the indictment were properly denied.

2. A timely motion by defendants, supported by affidavits, and later amended, was made before trial to suppress certain evidence in the possession of the government. The motion averred that the evidence had been produced by defendants in reliance on a promise of immunity. More specifically, it averred that the Bureau of Internal Revenue, through the Secretary of the Treasury, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and other responsible treasury officials thereunto duly authorized, publicly offered and held out to all of those whose income tax returns contained omissions or misstatements, that there would be immunity from criminal prosecution in any case where the taxpayer who filed such return would come forward before investigation had been initiated and acknowledge the existence in such return of omissions or misstatements, and the Treasury Department in such case would merely assess such unpaid tax, interest, civil penalties, if any, as might thereafter be determined to be due, and that said offer was and had been in full force and effect. The motion likewise set forth that such timely acknowledgement was made to a responsible officer or agent of the Treasury Department in January, 1948 of the returns of Shotwell for the years mentioned in the indictment; that the defendants informed said agents of the Treasury Department, among other things, that said returns contained omissions and misstatements in that they intentionally failed to include, under the heading of gross sales, all or part of the sums received by Shotwell through sales of goods, and they failed also to include under the heading of "costs of goods sold", various payments made by defendants for said goods, which receipts and payments were in excess of the ceiling prices[5] as set by the laws and regulations of the United States at the time such goods were purchased. It was also stated in the motion that the defendants at said times stated that Shotwell, through its officers, was ready, able and willing to pay such unpaid tax, interest and civil penalties, if any, as might be determined to be due after inspection and investigation by the agents of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The motion also set forth that, at the time of the disclosure, Shotwell's over the ceiling payments for raw material were not deductible as a part of the cost of goods sold, under the rulings of the Commissioner.

The motion also averred that the officers and agents of the Treasury Department acknowledged the sufficiency and timeliness of the disclosure, and that the defendants, at the request of said officers, caused to be made available to them the books and records of Shotwell, and the individual defendants communicated to them information in their possession materially related to said omissions and misstatements and not available to such officers and agents through said corporate books and records, which information could not have been obtained from the individual defendants in any manner in view of their constitutional privilege and rights, and also that the defendants caused certain accountants to be employed to assist the said agents in obtaining the facts. Shotwell thus incurred and paid auditing charges in excess of $20,000.

The motion also set forth in substance that in pursuance of the foregoing, the Treasury officials examined the corporate books, records and data, and made copies thereof continuously over a period of more than four years preceding the return of the indictment, and did not advise the defendants that said disclosure was untimely or insufficient, or that criminal prosecution was or had been contemplated, or that it might be recommended; that, notwithstanding the foregoing, said officials shortly before the proceedings before the grand jury which resulted in the indictment herein, repudiated the said offer so relied and acted upon by the defendants, without granting to them any hearing or conference, and without communicating to them the amount which, upon such inspection, the Bureau of Internal Revenue had determined to be due, and without affording Shotwell or said officers or its behalf, an opportunity to pay such amount. The motion charged that the said actions of the Bureau of Internal Revenue constituted an improper inducement of a confession or admission of facts upon which a criminal prosecution might be based and an illegal search and seizure of the books, papers and records of the defendants, and that, in consequence, the admission in evidence of all books, records, papers and statements so obtained, and any copies thereof or data procured therefrom as a result of information obtained therefrom, would violate the rights of the defendants under the fourth and fifth amendments to the constitution of the United States.

A hearing was held on the motion to suppress. The following is a statement of the facts proved, including only those facts shown by the government's evidence wherever there was a conflict.

Leon J. Busby, a certified public accountant under the laws of Illinois, was a member of the firm of Busby and Ourv, located in Chicago. Beginning in 1942 that firm did the general auditing work of Shotwell for the purpose of certifying financial statements used in credit channels. The firm prepared Shotwell's income tax returns, installed efficiency systems, and did other matters of a general accounting nature.

In January, 1948, at the request of defendant Cain, Busby made a trip with Stanley Graflund, vice-president and comptroller of Shotwell, to the plant of General Confections Company in New York, to determine whether a loan of $50,000 to General Confections, requested by David G. Lubben, would be financially secure. Having made a cursory survey, he reported to the Shotwell officers, including Graflund and defendants Cain and Huebner, that the survey did not justify such a loan.

Although Busby was active in the supervision of the auditing work for Shotwell, he did not know that Shotwell had received over-ceiling or premium payments. During this trip Graflund told him of that condition. In reporting on January 11, 1948 to Cain and Sullivan, Busby recommended against making the loan, and told of Graflund's revelation about the collection of over-ceiling prices for candy sold by Shotwell to General Confections, that Graflund had said that he did not know how much the over-ceiling payments were, and that he (Graflund) also thought "the money had been paid out by Shotwell." Busby said that he told Cain and Sullivan that, while it might not be that Shotwell was in a serious position, they should file an amended return to get the matter on record, and they discussed it for a while. Cain and Sullivan readily admitted the over-ceiling payments. They asked Busby "whether or not it would be in order to discuss the matter with the department." Busby told them that he thought it would and that, even if they made the disclosure, which was, in his opinion, the customary thing to do, "there probably would be nothing to it except that it would clear Shotwell of omissions from the tax returns." Busby directed their attention to the fact that it was a common thing to make disclosures to the department, and in so doing he did no see that there were any serious consequences, and that "there wouldn't be any critical attitude of the department towards them."

This discussion about making a disclosure occurred off and on between these men for a couple of weeks. They assigned Busby to communicate with the department, after having discussed the possibility of sending a lawyer.

About March 15, 1948, Busby went to the office of the Chief Deputy Collector in Chicago, Ernest Sauber, and told Sauber that he had a client which had been engaged in over-ceiling sales and over-ceiling purchases, which were not reflected in its books, that the client "wants to clean up some omissions from his tax return", that he [Busby] had been asked to prepare amended returns; that he had been unable to ascertain the exact figures and he did not know how he could prepare amended returns without having the figures, and he asked Sauber's advice on how to proceed. In response to Sauber's inquiry, Busby said that these transactions were handled all in cash, the part representing the over-ceiling payments was kept in a cash box, which cash was used to make over-ceiling purchases; that said transactions to a large extent "washed each other"; that when it was no longer necessary to make over-ceiling sales and purchases, the balance in the cash box was taken into the corporate records and declared as income for the year that the OPA ceiling ceased to exist. Busby told Sauber that "we wanted to go into the matter and have the agent come out and examine the situation and see what the real condition was and if there was any net amount due to the Government, we wanted to pay it."

Sauber told Busby that he could not prepare amended returns on the basis of his then knowledge, and suggested that Busby get statements from every individual at Shotwell who had anything to do with these transactions, and therefrom reconstruct the figures necessary for an accurate return, and after the figures had been reconstructed to ask the internal revenue agent's office to audit the Shotwell return. On this occasion Sauber advised Busby that if the disclosure was timely and the facts that he had related to Sauber were correct, the latter saw no reason why the immunity from criminal prosecution policy of the Bureau should not be applied.

The next day Busby met Cain, Huebner and Sullivan and told them that Sauber recommended that one of the officers come forward and disclose the identity of the taxpayer and "that if this were done, they should proceed to determine as nearly as possible how much was involved, and he saw no reason why there should be any trouble with respect to criminal prosecution in case of timely disclosure." Sauber had said that either an officer of the company or its representative could make the disclosure. Busby also told the individual defendants that Sauber said that there was no need for amended returns. Cain, president of Shotwell, told Busby, to go to the collector's office and "disclose the whole affair, the whole details."

On one of various visits of Busby to Sauber's office, Sauber asked if Busby knew how much was involved, and when given a negative answer and told that Shotwell had no specific records from which that could be determined, Sauber suggested that Busby gather "such information as we could from any memorandum or memory and summarize it on a form, and in the meanwhile he would contact the office of the agent in charge and have an auditor come out and work with us for the purpose of substantiating or getting together the true facts as nearly as could be accomplished." Sauber said that he would have the Agent in Charge, Mr. Wright, send out an agent to verify the summarization, or help to compile it. He said that the Agent "was to cover an examination of the books which would include just about a routine audit, verification of the tax returns; that he would examine the books and any other data that we had to submit to him."

Within a week Busby brought Cain into Sauber's office and said that Shotwell was the client that he had referred to in the previous meeting. Cain then told Sauber the same story that Busby had told him, and that "they did not know how to proceed in order to correct their tax returns." Sauber gave Cain the same advice he had given Busby, and told him "to ask for an audit of their returns."

Cain told Sauber that he had two boys in school and he was worried about publicity, and Sauber said that there would be no publicity on the case, that the only time an income tax case received publicity was when there was an indictment. Sauber told Cain that in his opinion this was strictly a civil case and that it was not a criminal case; and that he had nothing to worry about so far as publicity was concerned.

About thirty days thereafter (latter part of April, 1948), Cain telephoned to Sauber and said that his advice had been followed, a meeting of all Shotwell people connected with the black market transactions had been held, and that figures had been prepared which he would like to come in and turn over to Sauber. The latter said that he had no jurisdiction in the case, that corporation returns were handled by the Revenue Agent's office, which he should call and request an audit of the Shotwell returns. At Cain's request, Sauber called the Revenue Agent's office. Ralph Johnson, the group chief in that office, agreed to do it. Johnson said he would schedule the returns for audit. Sauber said the cases had not been assigned for audit to any particular agent.

Thirty days later and several times thereafter, Cain called Sauber and stated that no one had come from the department. He was very insistent that the audit be started. Sauber learned by inquiry at the Revenue Agent's office that there had been delays there due to misunderstanding in regard to the name of Shotwell. Sauber reported this fact to Cain.

From 1945 through 1948 the procedure in the office of the Collector of Internal Revenue in regard to corporate returns was that after returns were filed with the collector they were sent to the Bureau at Washington for statistical purposes and for clarification purposes. The Bureau would make a survey of the returns and select those which it believed were worthy of examination in the field. They were then sent to the office of the Internal Revenue Agent in Charge and there was a further classification made of those returns in the local office. Those returns which a local office believed required investigation were retained, sent to the record section where an office card record was made and then they would be sent to the various groups for investigation by their agents.

As to the Shotwell return for 1945, the card record fails to show on what date it was determined that the return should be audited or investigated. What the card does show, as interpreted by Holz, a government witness, is as follows: On January 15, 1947, the 1945 income tax return and the 1945 excess profits tax return of Shotwell, were assigned to Group Chief Magnus for audit in the field, and Magnus assigned them to Agent Korman on January 20, 1947. Korman filed a report on August 5, 1947, and either then or later an agreement was signed consenting to the assessments of deficiencies, such agreement specifying that the taxpayer waived his right to petition the tax court, and consenting to an immediate assessment of the deficiencies. This may have occurred at any time from August 8, 1947 to September 26, 1947, when the card record indicates that the case was disposed of.

As to the 1946 Shotwell return, the card record indicates that on December 11, 1947, the card was made out, and that on December 16, 1947, the return was assigned to Group Chief Granahan for investigation in the field by one of his agents, which means for an audit. On July 22, 1948, the card indicates the return was sent to Group Chief Johnson, and then on February 4, 1949, to Group Chief Williams, now deceased. The record is silent as to when any investigation or audit commenced as to the 1946 Shotwell return.

In 1949 Cain called Sauber and reported that three men had been auditing the Shotwell returns, and asked what could be done to expedite the closing of the case. Sauber referred him to Wright, Internal Revenue Agent in Charge. A week later Cain told Sauber that he had seen Wright and had "gotten nowhere" with him, and requested Sauber to find out what the difficulty was. After talking to Wright, Sauber advised Cain that the difficulty was Shotwell "would not tell the Government to whom the over-the-ceiling purchase payments had been paid, and until such time as the Shotwell Manufacturing Company would tell the Government or identify the persons receiving the over-the-ceiling purchase payments, the case would not be closed, that they would be required to cooperate with the Government before they would consider closing the case."

Cain then told Sauber "he could not identify the persons receiving these payments; the only persons that he knew of was a Dr. Doe in the Board of Trade Building, that someone had sent some money to, and that he himself thought it was a fictitious name and he would not appear ridiculous naming a Dr. Doe, and that was the only person he knew that had received any of these payments, and he would not reveal that name because he himself thought it was fictitious."

All corporate records were made available to revenue agents Krane and Mammel.

Revenue agent Krane came to work at the Shotwell plant in June or July, 1948, and he came in from time to time over a long period of time. In July, 1948 Busby, having prepared a tentative schedule, gave it to the revenue agent, when he appeared at the plant to examine the books.[6]

On February 7, 1949, revenue agent Mammel was given the Shotwell case. He had nothing to do with a decision as to whether there should be a recommendation of prosecution. The discretion in that regard was vested in the Intelligence Office, and he was not in that office. Although he could recommend a prosecution, those vested with authority could refuse to prosecute. In March of 1949, he talked to defendant Cain and told Cain that there might possibly be prosecution and therefore he (Mammel) had to do a perfect job in his investigation [of the accounts of Shotwell] so that he would not have to do the work over again. He did not tell Cain that he considered what they had done constituted a voluntary disclosure.

Early in 1951, Cain and Sullivan visited Wright and discussed the case in detail, at which time Cain stated that he wanted a bill. Wright again assured them "that he would check into it and see if a bill could be brought forth." Cain asked Wright if they "couldn't get the tax matter settled."

In October, 1951, Cain talked to Oscar W. Olson, Mr. Wright's assistant, who told him that he would prefer that he see Mr. Wright, "but if I were you I'd have no worry about it at all."

Prior to the indictment on March 14, 1952, the defendants were never notified what amount of tax the Bureau of Internal Revenue had determined was due.

On May 28, 1945, former Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau stated at a press conference that "some taxpayers who have failed to declare their full income and pay the tax due may escape criminal prosecution through voluntary disclosure of the deficiency only in cases where such voluntary disclosure is made before investigation is started."

On August 21, 1945, former Secretary or the Treasury Vinson stated through the press: "No one is going to jail for an honest mistake in filling out his tax return. Treasury policy even permits the wilful evader to escape prosecution if he repents in time. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue does not recommend criminal prosecution in the case of any taxpayer who makes a voluntary disclosure of omission or other misstatement in his tax return * * *. Monetary penalties may be imposed for delinquency, for negligence and for fraud, but the man who makes a disclosure before an investigation is under way protects himself and his family from the stigma of a felony conviction. And there is nothing complicated about going to a collector or other revenue officer and simply saying, 'There is something wrong with my return and I want to straighten it out.' "

On October 15, 1945, the then Commissioner of Internal Revenue "stressed the bureau policy of refraining from instituting criminal proceedings against taxpayers who come forward voluntarily and pay up delinquencies plus interest and civil penalties before the Bureau has begun investigating their cases."

On May 14, 1947 the chief counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue said in the course of an address: "The law requires the prosecution of the tax evader and that is what the Department recommends to the Attorney General. There is one important exception to that. * * * The Department has always encouraged voluntary disclosures. * * * The making of a voluntary disclosure is a simple thing. The taxpayer or his legal agent can go before any official of the Bureau of Internal Revenue or any of its field offices—whether it is the collector, a deputy collector, a revenue agent, a special agent, or any other responsible Treasury officer. There is no special form for making the disclosure. The simple statement that 'I have filed false tax returns and I want to make the government whole,' would constitute a complete disclosure. * * *"

The government's brief sets forth the following as the reasons the district court denied the motion to suppress:

The Treasury's voluntary disclosure policy required (1) the disclosure of a tax deficiency, (2) an admission that the taxes due had been wilfully evaded, and (3) good faith cooperation with the government thereafter in determining the amount of taxes due. The court made the following findings of fact: that appellant had never disclosed unreported income; that they had consistently denied any intent to evade taxes; that, far from showing good faith, they had attempted to deceive the revenue agents during the investigation; and that no government official had represented to appellants that their alleged disclosure would result in immunity from criminal prosecution.

In seeking to sustain the action of the district court in denying defendants' motion to suppress certain evidence, the government in its brief relies upon the reasons given by the district court, and adds that, "although the taxpayer who made a voluntary disclosure was not entitled to immunity from prosecution, an entirely different question would, of course, arise if the disclosure was made fully and fairly and in reliance on the policy, and if the action of the investigating agents gave the taxpayer good reason to believe that the Treasury would not recommend prosecution." The government contends that "that question has been determined adversely to appellants by the trial court's findings of fact, amply supported by the evidence summarized above, to the effect that the testimony at the suppression hearing indicated an entire absence of good faith on the part of appellants and no misleading actions or improper inducement on the part of the Government representatives."

It is obvious that both the district court and government counsel concede the existence of the Treasury Department's voluntary disclosure policy, and that the policy itself had valid legal standing. The differences of opinion here pertain to the application of the policy to this case.

(a) The evidence shows that defendants did disclose unreported taxable income. Their admission that they had omitted from Shotwell's return, over-the-ceiling receipts for candy sold, revealed income which should have been considered in fixing its tax, according to the Treasury Department's ruling that illegal payments for goods purchased were not deductible for tax purposes.

(b) While they coupled a disclosure of unreported income with a legal suggestion that that income was not taxable because it was offset by disbursements substantially equivalent thereto for over-the-ceiling purchases of raw material, contrary to the then legal contentions of the Treasury Department, they did disclose the facts. The voluntary disclosure policy referred to the disclosure of facts, and not to the disclosure of the legal contentions of a taxpayer's lawyer. Actually the legal contention made by the defendants at that time was not fantastic or unreasonable. This is established by the department's later reversal of its stand on such offsetting illegal disbursements, and its adoption of the same view that defendants suggested as to the law.[7] Therefore defendants' contention did not cast any doubt upon their good faith in making their disclosure of facts.

Nor was bad faith on their part evidenced by their conduct after making their offer of disclosure. They cooperated to the extent that they were able, and in complete compliance with the policy of the department. The insistence of the revenue agents that defendants go beyond their duty of disclosing facts material to the determination of their unreported tax liability, by informing the government of the names of the persons to whom they paid over-the-ceiling prices for raw materials, was met with a refusal by defendants. This refusal was not inconsistent with a full disclosure of relevant facts on their tax liability. First, in the various statements of the voluntary disclosure policy, there is no suggestion or requirement that a taxpayer must furnish information for the prosecution of others, except insofar as that information may be incidental to a determination of his own tax liability, and, secondly, in view of the government's position that payments by defendants of over-the-ceiling prices were not germane to the computation of defendants' tax liability, the identification of the persons receiving those payments was irrelevant. It can hardly be contended that a taxpayer, who comes in and admits that he incorrectly reported his income for tax purposes, can be required to become an informer against persons who may be criminally liable in transactions which are not pertinent to his tax liability.

We therefore hold that defendants' inability or refusal to name the recipients of Shotwell's illegal disbursements, did not show that their offer of disclosure was in bad faith.

(c) When confronted with defendants' admission that Shotwell had intentionally omitted taxable income from its 1945 and 1946 income tax returns, and an expressed willingness to pay what was due, and to cooperate with the Bureau of Internal Revenue in taking whatever steps were necessary to establish the amount thereof, the responsible heads of the Bureau in Chicago not only said nothing to indicate that the offer was rejected, but, in complete harmony with the policy of the Treasury Department in regard to voluntary disclosures, accepted the cooperation of the defendants and thereby obtained access to Shotwell's books and records, and conducted investigations which continued until an indictment was filed in the district court.

From March, 1948, when defendants made their disclosure to Chief Deputy Collector Sauber, until March 14, 1952, when the indictment was filed, defendants were led to believe by the government representatives that the course which they were pursuing would avert their criminal prosecution. At the March 15, 1948, conference between Busby and Sauber, when the nature of the income omissions was frankly outlined by Busby, Sauber said that, if the disclosure was timely and the related facts were correct, he saw no reason why the immunity from criminal prosecution policy of the Bureau should not be applied. Later Sauber told Cain, who was worried about publicity, that there would be no publicity in this case, that the only time an income tax case received publicity was when there was an indictment. He expressed the opinion that this was strictly a civil case, and not a criminal case, and that Cain had nothing to worry about so far as publicity was concerned. This statement is corroborative of defendants' contention that immunity from such prosecution had been offered in return for a voluntary disclosure under the department policy.

Early in 1951, Agent in Charge Wright told the defendants, who repeated prior requests that they be given a bill for their taxes, so they could pay it, that he would check into the matter and see if a bill could be brought forth. As late as October, 1951, Wright's assistant, Oscar Olson, told Cain that he had nothing to worry about at all.

These expressions from the representatives of the government, paralleling the Treasury Department's policy not to "recommend criminal prosecution in the case of any taxpayer who makes a voluntary disclosure of omission or other misstatement in his tax return," conclusively show that responsible government officials, from cabinet level to local level, had represented to defendants that their disclosure would result in immunity from criminal prosecution.

The government does not effectively support its contentions when it says that "As early as February, 1949, Cain was told by the examining agents that prosecution was possible." This is because first, Mammel, who is the agent who made such a statement, had no authority to decide who should be prosecuted and, secondly, if this were to be an announcement of intention by the government to prosecute the defendants, it came almost a year after the disclosure had been made by the defendants and accepted by the revenue officials, and long after the government, by means of the disclosure, had obtained information and records which it used in the prosecution of this case.

(d) The government seems to contend in this court that when the defendants made their disclosure they should have used words indicating that they had perpetrated a fraud upon the government or, as otherwise expressed, that they had wilful intent to evade taxes. Their disclosure showed that they knew that they had over-ceiling income, and that they had intentionally not reported it. That was all that was necessary. Nothing in the pronouncement of the policy required them, in making a disclosure, to use the language of a lawyer in characterizing their failure to report taxable income.

The application of the disclosure policy is not conditioned upon the officers of the corporate taxpayer exhibiting to the representatives of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a contrite spirit. It is not required by the policy that they appear in sackcloth and ashes and seek absolution from the internal revenue agent, or that he occupy the office of father confessor. When the taxpayer's representatives avail themselves of this policy they are not seeking moral forgiveness. The transaction is entirely amoral, one side seeking to avoid the criminal penalties which they have risked by their incomplete or erroneous return of income, and the government agents being engaged in the mundane purpose of collecting federal taxes.

We hold that as against this attack of the government, the disclosure by defendants was not defective.

(e) In a footnote in its brief in this court the government makes an oblique attack upon the timeliness of defendants' disclosure. We think the facts in evidence show that when the disclosure was made, no investigation involving the over-ceiling income of Shotwell during the taxable years had been started or even suggested or contemplated by the government. The disclosure was timely.

When the revenue agents get the scent and are in pursuit of the miscreant, it is too late for him to seek the protection of the Treasury Department's voluntary disclosure policy. Until then its door is open and the welcome mat is out.

(f) There is no inconsistency between the voluntary disclosure and the statement by Cain that the defendants would contest an assessment when made. That is the right of any taxpayer who would question the method of determining his tax assessment. By making a disclosure of facts upon which an assessment can be made, a taxpayer is not deprived of his right to be heard on the method used in making the assessment.

We hold that defendants made a valid voluntary disclosure in reliance upon promises of immunity. The evidence thereby obtained by the government stands on the same footing as an oral or a written confession induced by such a promise. The use of such evidence at the trial was a violation of each defendant's privilege against being compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, as guaranteed by the fifth amendment to the constitution of the United States.

It therefore follows that the court erred in denying the motion, as amended, to suppress such evidence. The use of that evidence at the trial makes it necessary to reverse the conviction of the defendants.

In view of the fact that a retrial will be required in this case, we find it unnecessary to rule on defendant Sullivan's contention that the district court erred in overruling his motion for a separate trial made at the close of the government's case-in-chief. Upon his retrial he is free to make a timely motion for severance. We express no opinion as to what the ruling thereon should be.

Inasmuch as important and substantial evidence should have been suppressed, the case must be retried. It is unnecessary to express an opinion as to whether the remaining evidence upon the trial below did or did not establish defendants' guilt, or to pass upon the other errors relied upon.

For the reasons hereinbefore set forth, the judgments of the district court are reversed, with instructions to sustain defendants' motion as amended to suppress evidence, and to retry the case.

REVERSED AND REMANDED WITH INSTRUCTIONS.

LINDLEY, Circuit Judge, Dissenting.

I regret that I cannot agree with the result reached in the majority opinion.

Disregarding the merits of the suppression question for the moment, it seems to me the majority fails to define clearly its interpretation of the Bureau's voluntary disclosure policy. The legal issue involved on this phase of the case seems to me to require an explicit determination of just what that policy is, whereas the language of the majority, I think, leaves the resolution of that question in doubt.

As to the merits of the order denying suppression, in the first place, I believe that the majority has overlooked the nature of the issues raised by the motion to suppress. These include the legal question of interpretation of the Government's voluntary disclosure pronouncements and, in addition, the question of fact as to whether defendants made a voluntary disclosure within the purview of the announced policy. And if these two issues should be resolved in defendants' favor, a further question then arises, in the light of the reported cases, of whether evidence given to the Treasury officials in reliance on the disclosure policy will be suppressed. That question is by no means settled. Compare Centracchio v. Garrity, 198 F. 2d 382, 388, cert. denied 344 U. S. 866 (CA-1), with In re Liebster, 91 F. Supp. 814.

Reverting to the legal question of interpretation of the policy statements, it seems to me the majority opinion turns on an assumption that any action by a taxpayer which advises a Treasury official that a tax return previously filed by him is incorrect or incomplete is a sufficient disclosure. Paraphrasing the language in part, the majority opinion seems to hold that any word which is sufficient to put the Treasury bloodhounds on the scent of a fraudulent return is a sufficient disclosure, irrespective of what facts are revealed to or concealed thereby from the government and irrespective of what roadblocks the taxpayer may thereafter erect in the way of a determination of the true facts surrounding the fraudulent return. Then, as I construe the majority's expressions, any evidence that the taxpayer may thereafter surrender to treasury agents must be suppressed, if criminal prosecution is recommended when the fraudulent omission is discovered.

Such a broad statement of the doctrine, I think, is an unwarranted interpretation of the Treasury policy. The Wenchel statement, upon which defendants place principal reliance, when considered in its entirety, carries with it the clear implication that the disclosure contemplated must be a full disclosure of all facts bearing on the false return. Secretary Snyder's statement, issued about 10 days after the Wenchel statement, after referring to the long existent policy, concluded that the application of the policy to a particular taxpayer "presumes, of course, that the repentant taxpayer cooperates with agents of the Bureau in determining the true tax liability."

Furthermore, I think the broad interpretation on which the majority opinion rests ignores persuasive judicial pronouncements bearing on this question. The Court of Appeals for the First Circuit in the Contracchio case, supra, said at 198 F. 2d at page 389: "If it be assumed * * * that evidence disclosed to the Treasury officials on the faith of the announced voluntary disclosure policy, and in compliance with its conditions, should be excluded from evidence in a subsequent criminal trial, it would seem that the taxpayer would have to satisfy the court that he made a voluntary, good faith disclosure of all data necessary to a correct computation of his income tax deficiencies, and that he made such disclosures before an investigation was under way." And in In re Monroe, 140 F. Supp. 507, aff'd 215 F. 2d 81, cert. denied 348 U. S. 914 (CA-5), the court defined the disclosure policy as containing the specification that the disclosure must be "a complete, fair and honest disclosure, and not a portion." While these authorities are not binding on us, the reasonable interpretation adopted by the jurists who penned those opinions is entitled to our respect and deserving of our serious consideration. See also Chieftain Pontiac Corp. v. Julian, 209 F. 2d 657 (CA-1).

The question, basically, is what would the average taxpayer understand, after reading the Treasury statements, as to what would constitute a sufficient disclosure thereunder. The trial court, consistently with the pronouncements made in Contracchio and Monroe, applied the rule of reason that a "disclosure" requires a good faith disclosure of all facts pertinent to the fraudulent return. This, I believe, is a correct analysis of the policy as announced and insofar as the majority opinion is based on a less restrictive rule, I respectfully dissent.

The second point on which I believe the majority falls into error is in its treatment of the suppression question as one wholly of law. It seems to me that the majority attempts to try the factual issues de novo and fails to give the requisite weight to the trial court's findings of fact which are essential elements of the question under review.

The weight to be accorded by a court of appeals to such findings has been variously defined. In Robertson v. United States, 165 F. 2d 752, at 754 (CA-6), the court pointed out that "the finding of the trial court on a preliminary question of fact should not be reversed on appeal if it be fairly supported by the evidence." In Nichols v. United States, 176 F. 2d 431 (CA-8), the court said at page 432: "The facts as determined by the trial court are supported by evidence, * * * and are binding on this Court." And in Cannon v. United States, 166 F. 2d 85 (CA-5), the court's language was, at pages 86-87: "It cannot be said that the judge's findings on this question were without substantial support. Therefore we will not disturb those findings."

In each of these cases, the findings to which reference was had were made by the trial court in ruling on a motion to suppress evidence allegedly obtained by an illegal search and seizure. While these decisions, as well as the subsequently adopted rule which embodies the then existing case-law,[1] pertain only to the classic search and seizure question rather than to the Treasury's voluntary disclosure doctrine, the proceeding to suppress the evidence is the same and the same procedural rules should be applied. If adequate evidence supports the findings upon which the trial court's ruling is based, we cannot disturb those findings.

1. Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure 41 (e), effective October 20, 1949, 18 U. S. C. A. See note to subdivision (e), Notes of Advisory Committee on Rules, 18 U. S. C. A. p. 463.

See White v. United States, 194 F. 2d 215, 217, cert. denied 343 U. S. 930.

In its memorandum decision denying defendants' motion, the district court found that defendants had not sustained the burden of proving that a sufficient voluntary disclosure within the purview of the announced policy had been made by them. It found that there had been "no disclosure of an intentional violation or * * * of an intent to defraud the Government" in view of defendants' position, which they maintained at all times, that no tax liability could arise from Shotwell's failure to report black-market receipts, since such receipts and corresponding black-market disbursements by the company "washed-out" each other, and that the disclosure to Sauber was merely an admission of omissions in Shotwell's 1945 and 1946 returns which were based on defendants' alleged good-faith belief that no added tax liability arose from the company's black-market operations.

As bearing on defendants' proof as to their good faith in the so-called disclosure, the court found that such records of the cash transactions in the black-market operations as the corporation had, had been destroyed on instructions of Cain prior to the initial conferences between Shotwell's agents and Sauber; that no bona fide efforts were made by defendants to reconstruct such destroyed records so as to enable the government to determine the amount of tax due, and that figures contained in work sheets turned over to Treasury agents as a part of the alleged disclosure were admittedly fictitious. The court found further that no promise of immunity had been held out to defendants by any representative of the government at any time, and that nothing was done by any agent of the Bureau to lead defendants to believe that the alleged disclosure was accepted as adequate or that there would be no criminal prosecution on account thereof.

Unless we can say that these findings are so lacking in evidentiary support as to require that they be set aside, we have no choice but to affirm the order denying the motion to suppress evidence. A brief recital of the facts underlying this litigation and a brief summary of the evidence before the court at the proceeding on the suppression motion sufficiently demonstrate, in my opinion, that the findings of the court, were amply supported.

When Busby, and later Cain, first approached Sauber, each reported that, during the taxable years 1945 and 1946, Shotwell had sold large quantities of candy to Lubben, or to Lubben's companies, at a premium price above the established OPA ceiling for the commodity. These shipments were invoiced to the buyer at the established ceiling price, and payments therefor at those prices were recorded on Shotwell's books and duly reported on its tax returns. The buyer was billed separately for the above-ceiling portions of the purchase prices. These payments were received by defendants in cash and were neither recorded on the company's books nor reported for income tax purposes. At the same time, it was reported that the cash thus received was paid out by Shotwell as above-ceiling premium prices for the raw materials which it needed, such as corn syrup and chocolate. On the basis of the representations thus made, Sauber, at that time, expressed his opinion that the facts disclosed strictly a civil matter. The indictments were returned after several years of investigation, during which time Shotwell employed Busby, an accountant, to work with the federal agents.

But the above facts tell only a part of the story on which the trial court's findings are based. The evidence adduced at the suppression hearing indicates that Shotwell's black market operations were more extensive than those first disclosed to Sauber. For example, Sauber was not advised that Shotwell, during the taxable period, made other black market sales of goods on which no part of the transaction was reflected on the company's books. Allusion has previously been made to other evidentiary facts bearing on the sufficiency of the alleged disclosure, namely, the fact that all records which reflected black-market operations were destroyed by defendants before they approached the Treasury officials and the fact that work papers and supposed summaries of the unreported income turned over to the agents were admittedly fictitious. Furthermore, defendants have maintained at all times that alleged black-market disbursements totalling hundreds of thousands of dollars were paid out by them without the benefit of any receipts, to faceless men who were unknown to defendants. At all times during the investigation they refused to advise Treasury agents as to who had received these disbursements. They took the position that to whom such payments were made was none of the Bureau's business, while at the same time fictitious figures were inserted in accounting data given to the agents which purportedly reconstructed the financial history of Shotwell's black-market dealings.

The point to be stressed is that on the record before us we cannot say that the evidence does not support the finding of the trial court that no sufficient disclosure was made. We cannot say that the court's conclusion that "False statements and fraudulent representations made to Government agents under the pretense of a voluntary disclosure can never constitute the basis for immunity from criminal prosecution under any possible interpretation of the so-called voluntary disclosure doctrine" is an erroneous legal statement or that the hypothecated facts included in this statement are not descriptive of the proofs made in this case. Two factual questions were presented to the court below, namely, what was disclosed, and, was the disclosure prompted by the taxpayer's reliance on the announced policy or by some other motive best known to him? The trial tribunal has found that, at most, only a partial disclosure was made; that good-faith cooperation with Treasury agents was lacking, and that such lack of good faith disclosed a purpose to mislead the agents. These findings are adequately supported by the evidence. It is not within our province to second-guess the trial court on factual questions.

In my opinion we cannot overturn the court's further finding that no promise of immunity was held out to defendants, or that no other representations were made, which reasonably led them to believe that no criminal prosecution was contemplated. Sauber's opinion, which he expressed during his initial meeting with Cain, that this was strictly a civil matter, was based on the latter's original statement that black-market income not reported for the taxable years was "washed-out" by black-market expenditures which was, as the court below found, a partial disclosure only of the true facts of the case. The oral testimony as to statements made at various times by Treasury agents that no prosecution was intended,—that defendants had nothing to worry about,—are disputed by the agents' testimony. Thus this finding is based, in large measure, on the trial court's ruling on the credibility of witnesses.

On the record as a whole, I cannot escape the conviction that the court's interpretation of the voluntary disclosure statements as requiring such a complete disclosure and good-faith effort as to enable the internal revenue agents to assess the additional tax due is a correct interpretation of the offer held out to taxpayers in the Treasury policy statements. Believing that the court's findings of fact are unassailable, I would affirm the decision denying defendant's motion to suppress the evidence and proceed to consider the merits of the appeal.

1. "Taxpayers who have failed to declare their full income and pay the tax due 'may escape criminal prosecution through voluntary disclosure of the deficiency only in cases where such voluntary disclosure is made before investigation is started'." 4. "And what is a voluntary disclosure? Respondents.

ON PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

BRIEF FOR RESPONDENTS IN OPPOSITION.

Statutes and Executive Promulgations Involved.

The Government's petition sets forth statutes which are not involved and fails to set forth a statute and Executive promulgations that are involved.

Section 145 (the penalty provision) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939, quoted in the petition, is not involved because no question as to guilt or innocence was passed on by the Court of Appeals or is now presented. Section 293 (civil fraud penalties), quoted in the petition, has never been involved and was not presented to the Court of Appeals.

Provisions that are involved are:

>
> (a) Authorization.—The Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, or of the Under Secretary of the Treasury, or of an Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, may compromise any civil or criminal case arising under the internal revenue laws prior to reference to the Department of Justice for prosecution or defense; and the Attorney General may compromise any such case after reference to the Department of Justice for prosecution or defense.
>
> (b) Record.—Whenever a compromise is made by the Commissioner in any case there shall be placed on file in the office of the Commissioner the opinion of the General Counsel for the Department of the Treasury, or of the officer acting as such, with his reasons therefor, with a statement of—
>
> (1) The amount of tax assessed,
>
> (2) The amount of additional tax or penalty imposed by law in consequence of the neglect or delinquency of the person against whom the tax is assessed, and
> (3) The amount actually paid in accordance with the terms of the compromise."
> (26 U. S. C. 1952 ed., Sec. 3761.)

Statements of Disclosure Policy:

The Government's petition fails to set forth any statements of the disclosure policy, and at pages 5 and 6 makes conclusory and inaccurate statements with respect to it. Relevant, accurate excerpts from Statements of the Disclosure Policy are as follows:

> 1. "Taxpayers who have failed to declare their full income and pay the tax due 'may escape criminal prosecution through voluntary disclosure of the deficiency only in cases where such voluntary disclosure is made before investigation is started.'" (Statement of Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau, May 28, 1945, R. 19.)

2. "* * * the man who makes a disclosure before an investigation is under way protects himself and his family from the stigma of a felony conviction. And there is nothing complicated about going to a collector or other revenue officer and simply saying, 'There is something wrong with my return and I want to straighten it out.'" (Secretary of Treasury Vinson, Aug. 21, 1945, R. 19.)

3. "Mr. Nunan again stressed the Bureau policy of refraining from instituting criminal proceedings against taxpayers who come forward voluntarily and pay up delinquencies plus interest and civil penalties before the Bureau has begun investigating their cases." (Press Release of Treasury Department, Oct. 5, 1945, R. 3132.)

4. "And what is a voluntary disclosure? A voluntary disclosure occurs when a taxpayer of his own free will and accord, and before any investigation is initiated, discloses fraud upon the Government. * * * The simple statement that 'I have filed false tax returns and I want to make the Government whole' would constitute a complete disclosure. * * * We are not concerned with the motivating force behind an individual's deciding to come in and talk to us about his evasion. If he 'gets religion' before we have done anything he will not be prosecuted. (Address by J. P. Wenchel, Chief Counsel of the Bureau, publicly released by Treasury, May 14, 1947, R. 3134, 3136-7.)

5. "One of the important elements in settling cases, with civil penalties and without prosecution, has been the Treasury's policy of not prosecuting persons who make a voluntary disclosure of their fraud before the Treasury begins an investigation of their cases. This means that, in order to assure himself against criminal prosecution, a repentant taxpayer must disclose his fraud to an official of the Bureau of Internal Revenue before the case has been assigned for examination and before an investigating officer of the Bureau has requested advice from appropriate officers of the Bureau regarding the case. Prior to such action * * * a taxpayer may make a voluntary disclosure and escape criminal prosecution even though his name may appear in an inactive file of suspects. This presumes, of course, that the repentant taxpayer cooperates with agents of the Bureau in determining the true tax liability." (Press Release of the Treasury, May 25, 1947, R. 3140.)

Abandonment of Disclosure Policy:

"While it has been the long-established policy of the Treasury Department to refrain from recommending criminal prosecution where taxpayers make voluntary disclosure of intentional tax evasion prior to the initiation of an investigation by the Bureau of Internal Revenue it has been concluded that such policy will no longer be followed. * * * In the administration of the policy it has been difficult and at times impossible to ascertain whether the disclosure was made because the taxpayer realized he was under investigation or whether the disclosure was in fact voluntary and in reliance on the immunity held out by the policy." (Treasury Department Information Service Release of January 10, 1952, R. 3142.)

STATEMENT.

The Court of Appeals held that convictions of respondents in a criminal income tax case must be reversed and the case sent back for a new trial because the District Court erred in denying a pre-trial motion to suppress evidence furnished, or made available, to the Government in reliance upon the immunity promises of the so-called "voluntary disclosure doctrine."

The "Statement" of the Petition obscures the narrow, and largely academic, question on which certiorari is sought, and by commingling asserted evidence on the merits with that bearing on the pre-trial motion to suppress evidence, presents the case in inaccurate focus.

The facts as to respondents' voluntary disclosure of tax irregularities in reliance on the Treasury's promises of immunity to those who did so, are accurately set forth by the Court of Appeals. The petition, despite its claim that certiorari should be granted because the Court of Appeals exceeded its powers of factual review, does not quarrel with those undoubted facts but with the conclusion the Court drew from them. In fact by its Petition for Rehearing in the Court of Appeals the Government (with one minor exception which the Court corrected—Pet. p. 73), accepted the facts as stated by the Court of Appeals. But the present Petition seeks to find fault with them and to color the case with carefully selected items of evidence bearing on guilt or innocence. A restatement is necessary to place the suppression issue in true perspective:

Shotwell Manufacturing Company was a substantial Chicago candy manufacturer. (It actually paid $827,000 taxes for the years 1945 and 1946.) In 1944 one David Lubben, a New York trader, asked whether he could get its candy to sell if he could produce chocolate (then in short supply), for Shotwell. He was told that he could. Various "trade" or "barter" deals took place in late 1944 and the first half of 1945 in which, in return for making raw materials (principally chocolate) available, Lubben was placed on Shotwell's customer list and sold candy. According to respondents, these transactions were all at ceiling prices; according to Lubben, he paid cash "overages" or "premiums" on the candy he received but did not charge a premium on the material he supplied.

In the spring of 1945 the ceiling price on corn became unbalanced with respect to that on hogs; farmers, finding it more profitable to use their corn for feed, withdrew it from the market. As a consequence corn refiners were unable to supply corn syrup (essential to the manufacture of Shotwell's candies) in normal and required amounts. When this shortage developed Shotwell cut Lubben, a new customer, off its list and sold him nothing for three months commencing in June 1945. (Def's Exs. 1 and 2, R. 3091 et seq.)

Late in September 1945, according to respondents (R. 2546, 2574), Lubben approached Shotwell and offered to pay cash "overages" on candy, which cash would be used to pay over-ceiling premiums on raw corn which would then be made available to refiners at ceiling; the refiners in turn would sell Shotwell a portion of the resulting syrup at ceiling. Whether over-ceiling sales of candy to Lubben began at this time, as respondents contend, or had started earlier as Lubben claimed, was an issue at the trial. But admittedly at this time, and for about 9 months thereafter, over-ceiling sales were made to Lubben (alone of all Shotwell customers), although not admittedly at the rates of overage which he claimed.

Although respondents were aware (R. 774) that Shotwell was violating OPA laws by these over-ceiling sales of candy to get cash for over-ceiling premiums on corn,[1] they believed no income tax problem was involved because the receipts and disbursements balanced (except for a small terminal balance which remained when the corn shortage ended and which was reported on the company's books). (R. 205, 1827-8, 2554, 2585.) According to respondents, the transactions ended in the summer of 1946 when the ceiling on corn was removed; notwithstanding this, Lubben claimed that they continued for some five or six additional months.

In early 1948 respondents were advised by their auditor that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue did not concede that over-ceiling expenditures could be deducted from or balanced against, over-ceiling receipts and that possible criminal penalties might result from Shotwell's failure to report them. (R. 170-2, 1828-31.)

In January or March 1948 (the difference in date is immaterial), respondents, acting in reliance on the Treasury's invitations for voluntary disclosures, voluntarily disclosed these transactions to Assistant Collector Sauber who assured them that no investigation had been commenced (R. 231, 257, Opinion at Pet. p. 46). Sauber, pursuant to Treasury policy that was followed by the Commissioner until long after the indictment of March 14, 1952 herein, advised respondents that the over-ceiling expenditures would not be recognized as a deduction.[2] Cain, Shotwell's president, told Sauber that Shotwell had dealt with shadowy characters and paid them in cash. He said:

> "As to our expenditures I just can't tell you anything. I don't know."

Sauber replied:

> "* * * it wouldn't do any good if you did know because we wouldn't allow them anyway. We absolutely won't allow over-the-ceiling expenditures." (R. 232.)

As the Court of Appeals points out (Pet. pp. 42, 55), Shotwell then offered to pay any additional tax which the Bureau might assess based upon its additional gross over-

2. The Treasury's position appears in IT 3724, 1945 Cum. Bul. 57; 1949—1 CB 6. See also cases collected in 2 Prentice Hall 1955 Fed. Tax Service, Par. 11,308. On December 28, 1948, long after the disclosure here, the Tax Court held in Lela Sullenger, 11 T.C. 1076, that over-ceiling payments for goods resold, or used in manufacturing, could be considered as part of the cost of goods sold when determining taxable income. However, the Commissioner refused to recognize this case and fought other cases in the courts. Not until September 14, 1952, six months after the instant indictment and two months before the suppression hearing (November 12, 1952), did the Commissioner acquiesce in the Sullenger decision and withdraw IT 3724 (1952-2 Cum. Bul. 3, 7), which until that time had been binding on all agents with whom respondents dealt.

ceiling income and asked for a bill, reserving only the right to file claim for refund if it decided to contest the Bureau's position that over-ceiling expenditures were not deductible. Sauber assured them,

> "That is perfectly all right. All we want to do is get the tax. * * * I am a collector and I want to get the tax." (R. 232.)

Sauber suggested that respondents collect what information they could so that they could reconstruct the accounts and that agents would investigate the case. Cain assured him the Shotwell staff would do this and would ascribe to all of the Lubben transactions the highest amount of "overage" that Lubben might claim. (R. 232.) Promptly elaborate "recapitulations" were prepared which disclosed every sale Shotwell ever made to Lubben.[3] (Def's Ex. 1, R. 3091 et seq. Shotwell spent $20,000 doing this and furnishing clerical help to the Treasury to assist it in its investigation R. 200.) These "recaps" carried the "overages" in accordance with what were then understood to be Lubben's figures rather than the lesser amounts respondents claimed were correct.[4] This history is incorrectly compressed in the

3. The statement in Judge Lindley's dissent that "Sauber was not advised that Shotwell made other black market sales of goods on which no part of the transaction was reflected on the company's books" is correct only in an extremely literal sense and is grossly incorrect in its overall implication. When respondents orally disclosed to Sauber personally they did not purport to be giving a detailed accounting. However, the compilations they promptly prepared at his direction listed every transaction that subsequently was called into question.

4. These recapitulations were one of the items respondents subsequently sought to suppress. They were not suppressed, and were received in evidence as admissions of actual fact that Shotwell had received the amounts there shown despite the fact that the Government's own, and completely uncontradicted, evidence was that they were not represented to be true as to the amount of overages shown. They were based on applying to Shotwell's entire list of shipments (including "trade" or "barter" deals) the highest rate of overage which Lubben was understood "orally" to claim or as he was believed to show on his purported "records" which were never admitted to be true. (R. 2816, 2838, 2841.)

Petition (p. 6) to the misleading statement that in the summer of 1948 respondents "submitted schedules purporting to show that the corporation had received approximately $380,000." At no time did respondents "show" that Shotwell received any such amount. They "showed" the dates and invoice amounts of all transactions with Lubben and what the overages would be if all of Lubben's claims, as then understood, were given credence, i. e., "The whole crux of the computation is based upon what Lubben claimed." (R. 2841.)

These compilations were turned over to the investigating agents when they commenced their investigation. (R. 188-195, 319.) Indicative that everyone then believed that a good disclosure had been made is the fact that when one of the compilations was redrafted for greater clarity, the totals shown on the redrafted document, also turned over to, and accepted by the agents, bore the identifying or connecting notation, "Used in disclosure recap". (R. 3097-8-9, 3101.)

As the investigation proceeded some of the agents asked for names of the recipients of Shotwell's over-ceiling expenditures. It is uncontradicted that Cain was given the impression that these names were not needed to assess Shotwell's supposed tax but might furnish leads to possible tax violators. And in 1951 Sauber prepared a memorandum in which he reported on 1949 conversations that the case would not be closed until the Shotwell employees

> "* * * cooperated with their Government and disclosed the names of the individuals to whom these over-the-ceiling payments were made." (R. 3156. See also R. 241, 259, 273-4, 276, 290.)

sciously concedes that the money in fact was paid out,[5] is the only reason ever given by the Treasury for not honoring the disclosure. Although the Petition now speaks (p. 19) of respondents' "claim of deductible expenditures" and asserts a necessity of verifying such a claim to determine whether to impose a civil fraud penalty, there is not a scintilla of evidence of the presentation of such a claim by respondents, or the assertion of such a position by the Government, at any time material to the disclosure.[6] On

5. On the trial every witness, Government or defense, having any knowledge of the facts testified that whatever "overage" cash Shotwell received (except the small terminal balance) was paid out for corn. (R. 775, 782, 1732-4, 1736, 1737, 1740, 1742, 1748, 1783-5, 1790, 2010, 2012, 2462, 2467, 2547-8, 2577, 2581-2.)

6. The present assertion that the agents needed a full explanation of Shotwell's black market expenditures in order to assess a civil fraud penalty is indeed a cynical one in view of the fact that on September 15, 1955 the agents actually did assess such penalties. The Treasury's action presumably was unknown to, and unapproved by the authors of the petition for certiorari. In any event it leaves them in the difficult position of having assured the Court on October 17, 1955 that something could not occur which in fact had occurred September 15, 1955.

The specious idea that the agents needed a full explanation of Shotwell's black market expenditures in order to determine whether to assess a civil fraud penalty, even though Shotwell was not presenting a claim for deductions because of them, is a lawyer's erroneous afterthought that first saw the light of day during oral argument in the Court of Appeals.

So far as civil fraud penalties are concerned, it has been clear from the beginning that the Commissioner, rightly or wrongly, would have assessed such a penalty on the theory that the initial return had not included all gross income even though respondents had presented engraved receipts for over-ceiling payments in a sum equal to the unreported over-ceiling receipts. See, for example, Colonial Rubber Co., 10 TCM 434; Benjamin Weisman, 10 TCM 409, aff'd., 197 F. 2d 221 (1st Cir.); William A. Prater, 12 TCM 872; Marsha Silk Mills, Inc., 13 TCM 585; David J. Pleason, 22 TC 361; Harris v. United States, 125 F. Supp. 175 (M.D. Ga.); John W. Harrison, 11 TCM 1000. But certainly unless and until Shotwell presented, by way of an amended return or a claim for refund, a claim for deductions, the agents were under no duty or necessity of investigating. That respondents' failure to identify the recipients did not present the slightest barrier to the Treasury's ability to make a 50% fraud assessment is demonstrated by the fact that it did precisely that on September 15, 1955.

the contrary, respondents not only did not file such a claim, but they, and all agents concerned, understood that Shotwell was going to pay a tax on the gross amount of the over-ceiling receipts as the agents determined them to be. It was precisely because they had been informed by their own auditor (and subsequently by every agent of the Bureau) that no such deduction was permissible, that respondents had been impelled to make the disclosure.

But by the time of trial (September 1953) the law, if not clearly established at the time of the suppression hearing (November 1952), had become clear that over-ceiling expenditures for raw materials could be claimed as a deduction. (See Note 1, ante.) The difference between the law that respondents were faced with at the time of disclosure, when black market expenditures were of no help to them and immaterial to an assessment of Shotwell's tax, and the law at time of trial, is one which the Petition obscures and which the District Court did not grasp.

Respondents, at trial, were able to, and did, assert a defense that no additional net income resulted from the Lubben transactions. They proved expenditures necessarily in an amount of about $160,000, which expenditures the Government finally admitted in the Court of Appeals (Petition for Rehearing, p. 11). This sum was as great as that which any Government witness (except Lubben), claimed Lubben had paid (R. 2835, 1747, 782).

The Petition, seeking to create the impression that respondents did not reveal the full extent of their dealings with Lubben, asserts (p. 11) that respondents' disclosure summary, "revealed the receipt of approximately $380,000 in cash overages from Lubben for 1944, 1945 and 1946," whereas the Government adduced evidence on the trial tending to prove receipt of approximately $450,000 in 1945 and 1946 (Pet., p. 14). If it were conceded (which it is not), that the Government made the latter proof, the undisputed facts as to the disclosure summary are:

1. Every sale or shipment to Lubben was revealed.

2. The amount of "overages" applied to these shipments in respondents' calculations was never represented to be an admission of cash actually received but to be a computation of what Lubben claimed. (See footnote 3, ante.)

3. On this basis the initial summary G. Ex. 5 (R. 3090) showed a gross computation of $415,074.14 for 1945 and 1946 ($213,415.70 plus $201,658.44). Respondents asserted that even if such rates be assumed, Lubben did not make payment on certain shipments and suggested a deduction of $48,614.70 on that account.[7] Moreover, respondents did not compute or list overages on unbilled shipments which overages Lubben tacked on the amount of about $35,000 at the trial. These explanations, actually contained, although not quickly observable by a court, in the computations, explain the alleged disparity between the initial computation of Lubben's claims at $380,000 and his subsequent testimony of $450,000. In any event, all of the transactions, and both versions of them, were revealed and the agents were invited to determine the amount of overages on the version they might choose to accept.

4. The Petition asserts that Cain presented "meaningless plug figures" to show offsetting black market expenditures. As the Court of Appeals finds, black market expenditures were immaterial to an assessment of Shotwell's tax under the rules the Treasury was insisting on. So far as Shotwell's tax was concerned it made no difference to the Treasury in 1948 whether whatever Shotwell received remained in its till or was expended on the black market because the black market expenditures would not be recognized regardless of to whom paid and regardless of how well documented. Having been willing to concede that gross income be computed in accordance with Lubben's claims rather than the true facts, respondents obviously could not present a true account of how money that Shotwell did not actually receive was spent. Cain said "It isn't going to make any difference anyway, [i.e., the disbursements were not going to be allowed], so let's work the thing backwards." [merely present balancing figures] (R. 258).

5. The jury's verdict did not mean that it found there was an understatement of gross income in the amount of $450,000 or $380,000 or $100,000—all it had to conclude was that there was "substantial" unreported income

ARGUMENT.

The Petition should be denied because it presents no legal question of sufficient importance to warrant granting the writ:

It concedes that where there was compliance with the Treasury's former "voluntary disclosure policy", that the discloser at least is entitled to suppression of evidence obtained through the disclosure (Pet., p. 17). What might have been a major legal question calling for this Court's decision, i. e., does suppression result from compliance, is conceded.

The only question then remaining is whether the particular and undisputed facts of this case[8] show compliance and whether that fact pattern is a common one, likely to be repeated in remaining cases involving the disclosure doctrine, so that re-examination of it and exercise of this Court's supervisory authority is warranted. Plainly, the Petition does not meet the test of this question.

The most it is able to say (p. 20) is that the Solicitor General has been "informed" by someone in the Internal Revenue Service that there are "between 60 and 70 pending cases in which the question of a voluntary disclosure made under the former policy either has been, or may be, raised." A healthy caveat may be raised to such elusive "information"; a caveat that applies both to the number of the asserted cases and to the nature of the asserted potential questions.

8. Observe that the Court of Appeals based its decision on "only those facts shown by the Government's evidence wherever there was a conflict" (Pet., p. 42) and that the Petition, despite its strident but unspecific and undocumented claims of "conflicting evidence," does not contest the accuracy of this statement in the opinion.

To say that "a" question of some sort as to voluntary disclosure "may be" raised, is not to say that the narrow question presented by these facts has been, or will be, raised elsewhere and therefore should be decided by this Court. Up to this time the facts here presented are unique. If there was another comparable case pending elsewhere the Petition would not have failed to refer to it. It is apparent therefore, that if certiorari were to be granted, this Court's ultimate decision would establish no general rule of law.

I.

The Court of Appeals Did Not Hold That a "Partial" Disclosure Was Sufficient and Its Decision Is Not in Conflict With Any Other.

The first reason asserted for granting the writ is that it is "uncertain" whether the majority opinion means that a partial disclosure is sufficient to bring a taxpayer within the terms of the policy; that "if" it does so hold it is contrary to other cases (Pet. p. 20).

The answer is that the majority does not hold a "partial" disclosure is sufficient. On the contrary, its explicit predicate—the test against which it applied the undisputed facts—was that there must be a full disclosure of facts relevant to the tax liability. So far as it lays down a rule of law for the future, it is that there must be a full disclosure. This is demonstrated by the following language from the Court's opinion appearing on page 54 of the petition (emphasis ours):

> "The insistence of the revenue agents that defendants go beyond their duty of disclosing facts material to the determination of their unreported tax liability, by informing the Government of the names of the persons to whom they paid over-the-ceiling prices for raw materials, was met with a refusal by defendants. This refusal was not inconsistent with a full disclosure of relevant facts on their tax liability."

The Court of Appeals simply held that the matters as to which the District Court felt there was bad faith were all irrelevant to a determination of Shotwell's tax.

There is no difference between the substantive test enunciated here and expressed (to the extent it is expressed) in Centracchio v. Garrity, 198 F. 2d 382, 389 (C. A. 1st), certiorari denied, 344 U. S. 866; Bateman v. United States, 212 F. 2d 61, 65-66 (C. A. 9th); Monroe v. United States, 215 F. 2d 81, 84 (C. A. 5th), certiorari denied, 348 U. S. 914; or Application of Henry Lustig Co., 67 F. Supp. 306, 310 (S. D. N. Y.) affirmed, 163 F. 2d 85 (C. A. 2d), certiorari denied, 332 U. S. 775, referred to in the Petition.

Any notion that certiorari should be granted because the instant decision can be construed to authorize "partial" disclosures is wholly untenable.

II.

The Court of Appeals Did Not Substitute Its "Findings of Fact" for Those of the District Court.

The second reason asserted for granting the writ is wholly a procedural one that does not concern the merits of the suppression question—it is that the Court of Appeals improperly exercised its appellate function by "substituting its findings of fact for those of the District Court."

The theme reiterated throughout the petition is that Judge Nordbye found the disclosure was lacking in good faith, and that the Court of Appeals entrenched upon his fact-finding province by overturning this so-called "finding of fact." To build its argument, the petition wrenches this asserted "fact-finding" out of context and erroneously asserts that (a) it turned upon the resolution of conflicting testimony (p. 21) and (b) it related to facts affecting Shotwell's tax liability (p. 22). The introductory paragraph to the Petition's statement of the Question Presented is erroneously cast to create the impression that the alleged "fact-finding" related to material facts as to "their unpaid taxes", whereas, as we shall show, all of Judge Nordbye's findings of fact, his conclusion of "lack of good faith," and his strong language were directed solely to facts bearing on the possible tax liability of Shotwell's recipients, and not to Shotwell's tax liability.

The Court of Appeals overturned none of Judge Nordbye's findings of fact, but held that since Shotwell had fully disclosed the facts relevant to its own tax liability, a finding of lack of good faith could not be predicated on immaterial matters. The difference between Judge Nordbye and the Court of Appeals is not over facts but over law. This is conclusively established by the following passage from the opinion of the Court of Appeals:

> "We therefore hold that defendants' inability or refusal to name the recipients of Shotwell's illegal disbursements, did not show that their offer of disclosure was in bad faith." (Pet. p. 53.)

In that passage the Court of Appeals is accepting Judge Nordbye's factual determinations but differing with him as to the law.

The invalidity of present contention of the Petition is exposed by the fact that although the Department of Justice filed a vigorous petition for rehearing in the Court of Appeals, requesting en banc reconsideration, this contention was not raised. If the Court of Appeals had so far departed from the proper course of review as the present Petition asserts, we may be sure that the Department, as it would have been duty bound to, would have called it to that Court's attention—and probably quite pointedly. But in its petition for rehearing the Department proceeded upon the correct premise that what the Court of Appeals had done was to announce its view of what legal conclusions flowed from the material and substantially uncontradicted facts.

In the Court of Appeals the Government did not challenge the facts as recited by that court with but one exception. In the single minor, undeterminative instance in which the Court of Appeals had inadvertently relied on contradicted evidence and perhaps obliquely overturned a credibility determination by Judge Nordbye (with respect to a conversation by Olson), the petition for rehearing pointed it out and the Court of Appeals promptly corrected its opinion (Pet. p. 73). This record scarcely permits the Department now to assail the Court of Appeals for having made "an extraordinary departure from the accepted and usual course of judicial proceedings."

This failure to raise the point below is even more significant when it is realized that the dissent in the Court of Appeals was in part on the theory that sufficient weight had not been given to the trial court's findings of fact. The Department did not endeavor to support that theory in its petition for rehearing below, and although it now advances the theory here, it does not support Judge Lindley's reasoning but goes at the matter by quite another, and just as erroneous a route.

The dissent had said there were "two factual questions" presented below, namely, what was disclosed and was the disclosure made in reliance on the policy (Pet. p. 67). The error in this was that while those questions called for factual determinations there was no substantial conflict in the evidence:

It was clear that respondents had disclosed fully as to the receipt of income; that, whether unable or disinclined, they had not fully reported on the expenditures they were told were immaterial to the tax liability. It was equally clear they disclosed in reliance on the immunity promise of the disclosure policy, and that as a matter of law their motives in so relying were immaterial. No conflicts, no credibility determinations were involved. Faced with the fact that Judge Lindley's reasons could not be supported, the present Petition, in part by distorting the record, advances new ones. These shifts and changes would not be resorted to if there was substance to the claim that the Court of Appeals made new fact findings.

The basic answer is that the Court of Appeals held merely that a conclusion of lack of good faith in the disclosure could not be predicated on findings of fact related solely to matters that were immaterial to an assessment of Shotwell's tax at the time the disclosure was made, viz., Shotwell's black market expenditures.

Judge Nordbye made no finding that respondents failed to disclose their transactions with Lubben on which they were told the tax would be assessed without regard to expenditures.

Judge Nordbye predicated his holding of lack of good faith and his harsh language exclusively on facts relating to Shotwell's expenditures. He found (a) that an informal record which might have identified some recipients of Shotwell's expenditures was destroyed,[9] and (b) that the list of expenditures on the Busby compilations was fictitious. From these factual findings he held that a lack of good faith could be inferred. None of the disclosure pronouncements, however construed, ever said more than that the taxpayer must cooperate in supplying data relevant to his tax. None said he must go beyond that point and turn informer on other possible violators. But Judge Nordbye held that "good faith" so required.

9. This so-called record was a handwritten memorandum kept by Mrs. Morrill one of the Shotwell employees who for a time had charge of the box in which cash received from Lubben was placed awaiting expenditure for corn premiums. She had not been told to keep the memo; had never shown it to Cain; upon asking him whether it was of any value and should be saved she was told it was of no value and could be destroyed (R. 408-9, 785). Because of the agents' advice to Cain that black market expenses would not be recognized his view that the memo was of no value is easily understandable.

The Court of Appeals, changing none of the facts, held to to the contrary. That was a decision of law rather than fact. And right or wrong (we submit it is obviously right), it presents no departure from the proper function of an appellate court and no reason for granting certiorari.

In laying foundations for its present contention, the Petition confuses the issue by first departing from the suppression issue to deprecate the defense on the merits. Then (p. 22), it makes the wholly inaccurate assertion that the jury's verdict on the merits "necessarily indicated that it had reached the same conclusion [as to validity of the disclosure] as had Judge Nordbye," in the face of the fact that Judge Nordbye, by his instructions, had expressly forbidden the jury from passing on the disclosure question, had turned it into an argument for conviction (R. 2970) and had permitted many of the disclosure documents to go to the jury as evidence of guilt on the merits!

At page 19 the Petition asserts that it became "necessary that the claim of deductible expenditures be thoroughly investigated". This is pure invention. No "claim", in any legal sense, of "deductible expenditures" was advanced by respondents during the disclosure. The compilations made in response to Collector Sauber's suggestions and turned over to the agents were far from the presentation of a "claim", or an amended return, seeking allowance of the expenditures as a deduction from gross income. From the beginning Sauber had told respondents it would not do any good if they knew all about their expenditures and could prove them because,

> "We absolutely won't allow over-the-ceiling expenditures." (R. 232.)

As we have pointed out (Footnote 2, ante) Sauber's position was required by the Treasury regulation (I. T. 3724), which remained binding on all agents concerned with this case until six months after the indictments had been returned.

Finally, it is asserted that because the Court of Appeals held that the record showed,

> "* * * that responsible government officials, from cabinet level to local level, had represented to defendants that their disclosure would result in immunity from criminal prosecution," (Pet. p. 56);

it thereby substituted its own finding for Judge Nordbye's "that respondents had been in no way misled by representatives of the Government." (Pet. p. 33.)

The Court of Appeals was addressing itself to a quite different point than had the trial judge. Respondents had argued in the trial court that, entirely apart from the public pronouncements of the voluntary disclosure document, they were independently entitled to suppression of the evidence because of assurances made to them by local officials during the disclosure. It was that contention, which Judge Nordbye was disposing of in the paragraph of his opinion commencing "In addition, etc." (Pet. 33). Judge Nordbye was talking about what was said after the start of the disclosure—the Court of Appeals did not restrict itself to this. The statements are not in conflict. The Court of Appeals was addressing itself to the whole history of the representations made to respondents.

The facts, as set forth by the Court of Appeals, are without dispute that the immunity promises had been made; that when Busby first broached this case to Sauber the latter replied there was no reason the disclosure doctrine should not apply; that Sauber directed that the extensive compilations be prepared; that when some of the disclosure compilations were recast the new editions of them bore legends, "Used in disclosure recap", to identify items in them with those used in the first compilation; that repeated assurances were made that this was a civil case and there was nothing to worry about. It is clear beyond doubt that all concerned necessarily realized that respondents believed they were protected by the disclosure doctrine.

It is true that in carefully worded testimony Sauber denied that he had ever said, in so many words, that the disclosure as made was a good one and the Court of Appeals does not find that he ever made such an express admission. The Court of Appeals also recognized that Agent Mamel, long after the disclosure had been made, said there might be a prosecution. It is apparent therefore that the Court of Appeals did not overturn any finding of credibility by Judge Nordbye. What it did was to base its legal opinion upon the totality of the representations and conduct of all of the Treasury officials, from the highest to the lowest, as they affected this case.

There is no reason for certiorari here in order to lay down proper standards for appellate review. The Court of Appeals did not undertake to pass on questions of credibility or to overturn disputed factual findings. It merely exercised its duty of drawing legal conclusions as to what consequences flowed from the material and undisputed facts. It enunciates no improper rule of review.

III.

Because the Voluntary Disclosure Doctrine Was Abandoned Nearly Four Years Ago and Because This Case Turns, in Large Part, on the Shift in the Tax Law Relating to Black Market Expenditures, a Case Like It Is Very Unlikely to Happen Again. The Question Involved, Except for These Parties, Is Essentially Academic. Hence Certiorari Should Not Be Granted.

In a large measure this case revolves about the Treasury's change of position with respect to black market expenditures. Had the Treasury initially conceded that black market expenditures for raw materials could be taken as a deductible expense it well may be that respondents would have operated on their original belief that since the black market expenses "washed out" the black market income there was no reason to make a disclosure. And in such event there well might never have been an indictment. But the Treasury first took one position and then another. And the trial court insisted that the "good faith" of the 1948 disclosure be tested in the light of the 1952 law which made the expenditures deductible.

We believe it is apparent that even if the disclosure doctrine had remained in effect there would have been scant likelihood of a similar case getting into the courts. In view of the fact that the entire doctrine was abandoned nearly four years ago it is likely that there will be but few, if any, cases involving it in any way in the courts in the future; at this late date it is a virtual certainty that there will be none falling within the unique fact pattern of this case. In these circumstances we understand it to be the policy of this court not to grant certiorari. (Rice v. Sioux City Memorial Park, 349 U. S. 70.)

IV.

The Decision Below Was Correct.

For the reasons set forth in the Court of Appeals opinion the decision below was correct. (Bram v. U. S., 168 U. S. 532; Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. U. S., 251 U. S. 385; White v. U. S., 194 F. 2d 215, cert. den. 343 U. S. 930.)

Even if it were thought that there was not full and literal compliance with the voluntary disclosure doctrine, we submit that the Constitution would have required suppression of evidence obtained with the knowledge that respondents believed they were acting under the disclosure doctrine's immunity promise and were protected thereby. (Gouled v. U. S., 225 U. S. 298; McNabb v. U. S., 318 U. S. 332.)

Moreover, although we contend that respondents complied in good faith with every material requirement of the doctrine, it may be observed that the elastic concept of "good faith" is not contained in, or necessary to, the doctrine. It was a judicial concept attached to the doctrine by Judge Nordbye and applied by him to matters immaterial to Shotwell's tax. In England, which had a "disclosure policy" virtually identical with that of our Treasury, it has been held that a taxpayer who discloses is entitled to suppression, once he has disclosed the nature of his irregularities, even though thereafter, in an attempt to keep his tax liability down, he deliberately prepares false entries in purported regular records that misrepresent both his items of income and expense, Rex v. Barker, 2 K. B. 381 [1941]. Under the English view suppression must be granted regardless of good or bad faith.

The decision here may also be said to be correct, or to reach a justifiable result, from another point of view—we submit, for the reasons set forth in our conditional cross petition in No. 471, that respondents were entitled to the immunity promised them in the voluntary disclosure invitations and that the indictment should have been dismissed. If that is correct, then they were at least entitled to suppression as a lesser, but appropriate remedy.

V.

Certiorari Should Not Be Granted Because, If the Government's Contentions Are Permissible, This Court Would Be Required to Study the Entire 3,000 Page Factual Record.

It should be clearly understood that the Department of Justice is asking this Court to review the entire 3,000 page printed record to determine whether, as an entirety, it shows that the disclosure was defective. Although page 17 of the Petition admits > "* * * that if a taxpayer should have voluntarily disclosed an unpaid tax liability before investigation has begun, and should thereafter co-operate in good faith in a determination of the taxes due, he would be entitled to an exclusion of the evidence thus obtained * * *," it thereafter makes a number of factual assertions which have little or no relation to that question and in its footnote 4 asserts that this court should search "the whole record, not merely that portion prior to the ruling" to determine the validity of the suppression ruling.

Carrying this thought out it is asserted (p. 18) that the Government made proof on the trial that respondents, long after the disclosure, "attempted to settle the case through political pressure," from which the conclusion is sought that the disclosure was somehow defective. Obviously this is a non sequitur, and even if it be assumed that Shotwell, faced with a potential tax liability and with its business and customers disrupted by constant visitations of agents, was endeavoring to hasten settlement of its taxes, no connotation, either of criminal guilt or of failure in the initial disclosure, would flow from the assumption.

Again, it is argued that Lubben testified on the trial (we say falsely), that after the disclosure had been made one of the respondents tried to get him to leave the country; from this the petition seeks to infer that the disclosure was defective. Once more the conclusion does not follow from the assumed fact.

But more importantly, this Court could not properly pass on these and other asserted facts, which were vigorously disputed on the trial, without reviewing the entire trial record so that the evidence with respect to them could be placed in proper context and perspective. This, we submit, is so obviously not the function of this Court that it would appear that the charges were made only to prejudice the respondents. This seems clear because the Department of Justice has waived any right, if one ever existed, to ask this Court to consider on the suppression question evidence which went in at the subsequent trial on the merits. No claim was made to the Court of Appeals that it should do what the petition now asks this Court to do. On the contrary the Government there stood solely on the facts developed on the suppression hearing and on which the trial judge had acted (Gov't Ct. of App. Br. pp. 25-29). The present contention therefore is not only unsound but is not open (Helvering v. Minnesota Tea Company, 396 U. S. 378, 380; Forged Steel Sales Co. v. Lewellyn, 251 U. S. 502, 515).

It also may be observed that the Petition stresses the fact that the jury brought in a guilty verdict, from which the Court apparently is asked to conclude that the disclosure must have concealed something. Once more there is an obvious non sequitur. Moreover, the argument merely amounts to saying that because the Department of Justice obtained a conviction by using the evidence sought to be suppressed it has proved that the evidence should not have been suppressed—a thoroughly evil argument.

VI.

The Court of Appeals Did Not Err in Holding That the Disclosure Was Timely.

The petition suggests that the Court of Appeals erred in not sending the case back to the trial court to make a finding on the subject of timeliness.

The short answer to this is that the Government did not take this position in the Court of Appeals and cannot now take it here. (Helvering v. Minnesota Tea Company, supra; Forged Steel Sales Co. v. Lewellyn, supra.)

In their brief as appellants in the Court of Appeals respondents, to show that they had complied with all of the requirements of the policy, asserted that the disclosure was timely and said:

> "The evidence showed that at the time of the disclosure, and for months thereafter, the Shotwell return was in the hands of a Group Chief, along with hundreds of other returns, for a mere possible assignment for audit (R. 316). We doubt that the timeliness argument will be renewed [it had been advanced in the District Court before the suppression evidence was completed] but if it is, we reserve the right to reply."

When the Government filed its brief, it did not raise the issue. To demonstrate this we quote its "Summary of Argument" as an Appendix hereto. It relegated the entire matter to a mere passing footnote in its brief and the Court of Appeals properly said that it was presented only "obliquely" (Pet. p. 58). Actually the evidence was not in dispute, no questions of credibility were involved, and had the matter been contested in the Court of Appeals, it was in as good a position as the trial court had been to make a finding (Cf., City v. Denver Union Water Co., 246 U. S. 178; Horwitz v. New York Life Ins. Co., 9 Cir., 80 F. 2d 295, 302.) And its finding of timeliness is unquestionably correct.

Conclusion.

It is respectfully submitted that the writ of certiorari should be denied.

"Summary of Argument". Pages 31 and 32 of Government's Brief in Court of Appeals.

"IV.

"The voluntary disclosure policy was a self-imposed administrative restriction by which the Treasury Department agreed not to refer a taxpayer's case to the Department of Justice for prosecution, provided he had made a full and fair disclosure prior to the initiation of an investigation. Since it did not give the taxpayer any legal right to immunity from prosecution, the motion to dismiss the indictment was properly denied.

"The trial court found, upon the evidence presented at the suppression hearing, that appellant's alleged voluntary disclosure was totally lacking in good faith, and that no actions by Government representatives had given them good cause to believe that they would be granted immunity. Hence the motion to suppress evidence was properly denied."

REPLY MEMORANDUM FOR CONDITIONAL CROSS-PETITIONERS.

This reply is limited to the question of timeliness of the Conditional Cross-Petition. It should not be construed as a deviation from our basic position that certiorari should be denied in No. 470, this term, and in that event, here also. But if the writ should be granted in No. 470, it should be granted here.

We do not understand that the Solicitor General contends that the Cross-Petition is untimely. Nor could he well do so because inspection of the briefs in Johnson v. Eisentrager, 339 U. S. 763, reveals that in that case the Government considered, just as we assert here, that the running of time for certiorari was tolled for all parties where one of them (there the Government's opponent), filed a petition for rehearing below. The Court, without discussion of the point, allowed the writ. Stern and Gressman, in their Supreme Court Practice, 2d ed., p. 166, state that a similar result was reached in U. S. v. Crescent Amusement Co., 323 U. S. 173. (The briefs and record in that case are not currently available to us.)

Federal Trade Commission v. Minneapolis Honeywell Co., 344 U. S. 206, is of no assistance because it did not in any way involve a petition for rehearing, much less one in a criminal case in which the judgment is necessarily unitary (Cf. Heike v. United States, 217 U. S. 423). It involved successive judgments on separate and severable parts of a Federal Trade Commission order.

ANSWER TO MOTION (AMENDED) TO REMAND.

The Solicitor General's blandly stated Motion to Remand to the trial court so that additional evidence, some old but not heretofore "appreciated" and some assertedly new, may be spliced onto that taken in a 1952 pre-trial suppression hearing, all in an effort to bolster a conviction obtained in 1953 and reversed in 1955, masks a multiplicity of legal and factual perversions. Many of them are not apparent from the scanty statements of the Motion. We do not believe that any motion by the Solicitor General, no matter how ill-founded we believe it to be, can be regarded lightly. For these reasons we reply to it at some length, perhaps thereby giving it more color than it deserves.

The Motion is wrong in its basic procedural and substantive legal premises; its incorrect factual showing is mere hearsay and conclusory rather than direct and competent; lack of diligence is apparent; even if the Motion were sound, it is presented to the wrong court. It, and the petition for certiorari, should be denied. It is made against the following background:

BRIEF STATEMENT OF CASE.

Defendants, respondents to the instant motion, were indicted in 1952 for alleged falsities in the income tax returns of Shotwell Mfg. Co. (now named Homan Mfg. Co.), for 1945 and 1946. They asserted, by motion to dismiss, immunity from prosecution because in February 1948, in reliance upon repeated promises of immunity from criminal prosecution by the Treasury to those who voluntarily disclosed irregularities before investigation was initiated, they had voluntarily disclosed such to Ernest J. Sauber, then Chief Deputy Collector (subsequently District Director of Internal Revenue in Chicago). It was held by the District Court, and subsequently by the Court of Appeals, that the promised immunity was not judicially enforceable.

Defendants then moved to suppress evidence they had produced in reliance on the promise of immunity.[1] Evidence taken on this motion showed that the disclosure, which was wholly oral as permitted by Treasury pronouncements,[2] was participated in by only three persons: Leon Busby, Shotwell's auditor, Byron Cain, its president, and Sauber. They all testified and fixed the disclosure as occurring in January-March 1948; they agreed that Shotwell, at the time of the disclosure, confessed it did not have records and figures from which to prepare correct returns, and that such data would have to be assembled (R. 178, 202, 229, 231-3, 283, 284, 286) for use of a Revenue Agent who from it and other records would "audit" the company and assist in making a correct return. It was assembled and then was summarized in "recapitulations" (Def. Ex. 1, R. 3091 et seq.) which were furnished Agent Lima when he started his audit, in response to the disclosure, on, or shortly after, July 30, 1948.

At the suppression hearing the Government contended the evidence was admissible because the disclosure was invalid for two reasons: (a) Untimely, because the 1946 return had been "assigned" for audit on December 16, 1947 which date was contended to mark the "commencement of investigation" (R. 440-1, 445). The assignment contention proved to be without factual support and it is no longer contended that December 16, 1947 is the timeliness date (see note 3, post). (b) Insufficient, because after disclosure defendants did not supply sufficient information. The District Court adopted this latter theory; the Court of Appeals rejected it.

Now it is the Government's contention, contrary to its position in the District Court and the Court of Appeals, that "conceivably" no disclosure was made until after June 21, 1948; that this was too late to be timely because on June 21 the Government got a clue or "scent" which ultimately would have led to an independent investigation had no disclosure been made.

2. "There is no special form for making the disclosure. The simple statement that 'I have filed false tax returns and I want to make the Government whole', would constitute a complete disclosure." (Treasury release of May 14, 1947, R. 3136.) Note also that the supplying of data or cooperation in determining the true tax liability, if required at all, is in the nature of a condition subsequent to the disclosure. The disclosure itself was the act of disclosing oneself as a possible violator and inviting the Bureau to make an examination.

If it be assumed that a disclosure in July would have been untimely (which is not the case), the fact remains that neither Busby, Cain nor Sauber, the only participants to the disclosure, have recanted or changed their testimony as to disclosure in the January-March period. Nor is any contradiction of trial testimony claimed—only that the Government had evidence at the time of the hearing (which it did not use), and asserts it now has (but does not display) supplementary evidence, from which it is contended inferences inconsistent with a disclosure in the January to March 1948 period "conceivably" may be drawn.

SUMMARY OF REASONS FOR DENIAL OF MOTION.

1. In a criminal case the Government may not, after trial on the merits, move for a partial new, or additional trial of a suppression of evidence hearing, in an attempt to validate the hearing on the merits.

2. A new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is never given merely because such evidence "might conceivably alter" the result, all that is claimed here (Mo., p. 5), but only where it reasonably can be asserted that the evidence is so important and material that it will probably produce a different result.

3. The Motion is based on a new, incorrect and radically changed legal theory, not open to the Government on review, namely that the Revenue Service's act of inspecting certain of this taxpayer's records while in the course of investigating another taxpayer gave them a possible "scent" as to this taxpayer which would constitute legal "initiation" of an investigation of this taxpayer and would make a disclosure subsequent thereto "untimely:"

Such a legal theory was expressly disavowed in the trial court where the Government correctly conceded that the "timeliness" date, under the Treasury's voluntary disclosure doctrine, was to be determined by the Treasury's "objective" test of (a) when the taxpayer's return was actually assigned for audit, or (b) when an investigating officer requested advice (R. 440-1, 445).[3] The Government initially believed the assignment for audit, and hence the timeliness, date was December 17, 1947; however, the proof showed, without contradiction, that the Shotwell return was not then assigned for audit but merely for "survey" as to whether it should be audited (R. 393-6).

3. Government counsel have attempted to slide away from the "objective" test for determining "initiation of investigation", to change their basic legal as well as factual theory, without informing the Court they are doing so. They premise their motion on the legal theory that if someone in the Revenue Service picks up the name of B while investigating A, that ipso facto the Service has "initiated" an investigation as to B and any subsequent disclosure by him is invalid. No such theory was presented below. Counsel misapprehend a sentence in the Court of Appeals opinion which we quote below (emphasis ours):

Counsel show that on June 21, 1948 New York agents, investigating Lubben of New York, requested Chicago agent Krane to check information on Lubben by examining certain of Shotwell's books as to its dealings with him. They argue that this gave the agents the "scent" as to possible violations by Shotwell. There is no utterly factual basis for this argument because the agents got no "scent" from Krane's visit of June 21. What happened was that Close & Co., of Chicago, which had also dealt with Lubben, made a disclosure on August 20, 1948, that came to the attention of Intelligence Agents in Chicago. On August 31, the Chicago Intelligence Office, which was unaware that the Shotwell disclosure had been made and

No investigation of this taxpayer, independent of the one flowing from, or in verification of, the disclosure and which was commenced by assignment to Revenue Agent Lima on July 30, 1948 (Dft. Ex. 15, R. 3173), ever was commenced. There are indications that an independent investigation, flowing from clues picked up in the Close & Company revelations in late August 1948, (not from the asserted Krane clue of June 21), might have been initiated in late September 1948 (R. 3167). But by that time there is no dispute but that Chicago Agent Lima's examination in verification of the disclosure was well under way and the idea of an independent investigation was dropped. No step inconsistent with full recognition of a valid disclosure was taken until September 19, 1950, when agents in the Intelligence Unit requested that a "case jacket be issued," not because the disclosure that Agent Lima actually was at work checking on it, wrote to the New York Intelligence Office, suggested that "possibly similar over-invoice payments were received by Shotwell * * * from Lubben," and requested it to make appropriate inquiries of Lubben. New York replied on September 13, 1948, that it was informed that Shotwell had made a disclosure to the Revenue Agent's office in Chicago. Chicago Intelligence Agents then made inquiry of the Internal Revenue Agent in Charge in Chicago and found that Lima already was conducting his examination (See Agent Krane's report at R. 3166-7). Thus the present hindsight speculation that the Treasury obtained a "scent" on June 21, 1948, is contrary to the Treasury's own record.

But in any event "scent" is not enough. Even in the graphic and non-technical language of the foregoing quotation, the test is stated in the conjunctive, "scent" and "pursuit." Unless the agents were "in pursuit," i.e., had actually commenced an investigation, a taxpayer could still disclose. Even the Motion to Remand admits a disclosure at least as of late July 1948. The record shows, as we demonstrate in the text, that no investigation that can in any way be said to be independent of that precipitated by the disclosure and requested by defendants was ever initiated. The new theory thus would not invalidate the suppression order even if counsels' factual assumptions be accepted. (This note is no retreat from our position that the disclosure occurred in January-March 1948.)

had been untimely, but solely because Shotwell's officers allegedly "refused to identify the recipients" of Shotwell's over-ceiling disbursements for which it was not going to be allowed tax deductions (R. 3172).

The new theory that a disclosure in July 1948 would have been untimely is fruitless because no investigation had then been "initiated" within the admitted Treasury definition of that term.

4. The evidence is not new. The Motion concedes (p. 3) that much (we believe virtually all), of it had been considered in 1952 and 1953 but was not "appreciated." The Motion emphasizes that Chicago Agent Krane visited the Shotwell plant on June 21, 1948, and that Shotwell's controller, Graflund, telephoned its president, Cain, at a candy convention in New York, about the visit. This call, and Cain's reaction to it, were gone into on the suppression hearing in 1952 (R. 269-270) and the hearing on the merits in 1953 (R. 2614-5, 2559, 2679). The questioning demonstrated that one Daniel Tobias had heard defendant Cain's end of the conversation (R. 2614-15); Agent Krane heard Graflund's end. Cost records in the District Court show that Tobias was under subpoena and was paid $172.12 witness fees from November 10 to 14, 1952 (suppression hearing), and was under subpoena and was paid witness fees of $398.24 from September 17 to 27 and October 10 to 14, 1953 (trial), but neither he nor Agent Krane was placed on the stand.

The Motion makes much of the 4 to 5 month interval between the disclosure and the making of "summaries" or "recaps" of the Lubben account, seeking to create the illogical inference that because the summaries were not prepared until July 1948, no disclosure was made in January-March 1948. There is nothing new about the fact that the summaries were not made until July: When defendants made the disclosure they said they had no figures; that they would have to reconstruct them (R. 178, 202, 229, 231-3, 283, 284, 286, 2564, 2570, 2577, 2590). In testifying with respect to one of the final summary sheets, defendant Cain put it this way: "We had made our disclosure months and months and months before this sheet was put out" (R. 259). At the trial it was again clear that the data ultimately compressed into the summary sheets (Dft. Ex. 1 etc., Suppr. hrg., R. 3091, et seq.) was assembled "over a period of months" (R. 2585, 2590). Although no point was made by either side as to the precise date on which the summary sheets were prepared, it was clear that it had to be sometime in July 1948 because the testimony was that defendants were assembling underlying data and information during March, April, May and June (R. 2577); Busby testified he was still compiling data in June (R. 187), and as late as July 9, Cain was still trying to get confirmatory figures from Lubben's books through Tobias (R. 2616).

5. The Motion is not supported by the affidavits of the purported witnesses, who in some instances are in no way identified, but only by the hearsay statements and argumentative conclusions of interested lawyers and a detective.

6. If a motion by a prosecutor for a partial new trial can be countenanced in any court it should have been made to the Court of Appeals and not here. First, this Court has not taken jurisdiction; Second, it is established practice that motions on grounds of evidence theoretically discovered after a Court of Appeals decision, even after application for certiorari has been made here, go initially to that Court for a determination of whether there is a prima facie showing that warrants a change in its mandate and remandment to the District Court. (U. S. v. Johnson, 142 F. 2d 588, 589, C.A. 7, reciting action of this court sending the case back to the Court of Appeals; see also recitals in this Court's subsequent opinion in the same case at 327 U. S. 106. Contrast that case and this with Mesarosh v. U. S., No. 20 this term, in which, after this Court had taken jurisdiction, both sides agreed that there was tainted testimony by a prosecution witness and that there should be a further inquiry.)

HISTORY OF THIS CASE AND RELATED PROCEEDINGS.

Voluntary disclosure of irregularities in Shotwell's 1945-6 income tax returns was made in the spring of 1948. Indictment was returned March 14, 1952 (R. 5). On November 21, 1952, the District Court, after hearing, denied respondents' Motion to Suppress Evidence (R. 447). The hearing on the merits, in September and October 1953, resulted in convictions.

Appeal was taken to the Seventh Court of Appeals where oral argument did not take place until May 3, 1955. On June 15, 1955, the Court of Appeals reversed and remanded on the ground that the District Court erred in failing to suppress evidence furnished in reliance on the Government's promise of immunity. The Court did not pass on other important errors urged as to the hearing on the merits. Petition by the Government for rehearing was not filed in the Court of Appeals until July 30, 1955. It contained no hint of the matters now asserted.

Petition for Certiorari was filed October 17, 1955. Although this Court has not yet taken jurisdiction of the case, no motion has been made in the Court of Appeals calling its attention to the matters that are claimed to warrant modification of its mandate.

On December 6, 1955, the Solicitor General wrote to the Clerk of this Court and adopted representations of the Internal Revenue Service dated December 1, 1955, charging that Government witnesses Busby and Sauber, with respondent Cain, had given testimony that "was false in material and vital aspects." The letter said the Government expected to file a motion to remand to the District Court "at an early date" and requested that action on the certiorari application be withheld.

Before this letter was sent, Director Sauber, on December 2, 1955, was placed on administrative leave by the Internal Revenue Service. Departmental charges were filed against him, including one charging perjury in this case and reciting many other claims that are at least partially reflected in the hearsay affidavits here (App. I). He was suspended on March 2, 1956, and administrative hearings followed. We assert that those hearings exonerated him of any wrongdoing in connection with this case because, after hearing, no administrative finding of any wrongdoing herein was made. (Cf. Jolly v. U. S., 170 U. S. 402, 408; Selvester v. U. S., 170 U. S. 262, 267; Dealy v. U. S., 152 U. S. 539, 542.) The order there was removal from office on wholly distinct and admittedly "unrelated charges" on August 6, 1956 (Footnote 4 to Mo. to Remand).

In the meantime, in February 1956, the Treasury importuned the Justice Department to commence a new grand jury investigation involving, among other things, the asserted claim of perjury in this case. The grand jury investigation commenced in April 1956 and is still continuing.[4] No indictments have yet been issued.

4. This grand jury investigation is referred to in footnote 4 of the Motion to Remand. It has resulted in two proceedings to restrain believed improper use of grand jury process:

In the first of these, Homan v. Russo, et al., 233 F. 2d 547 (C. A. 7, May 11, 1956), it was held (a) that the grand jury could

On June 1, 1956, the Solicitor General again wrote to this Court and requested that this case be held over the term because "evidence sought to be adduced before the Grand Jury may, in the opinion of the Department, have important bearing on whether perjury was committed in the trial [sic] of the case." Apparently such evidence has not been forthcoming because the records of the District Court reveal no motion by the prosecutors under Criminal Rule 6 to have it made available to this Court.

As the matter now stands, Sauber has been exonerated of perjury in administrative hearings and the prosecutors thus far have been unable to come up with enough evisubpoena documents that were ordered to be suppressed in the main case, and (b) that allegations that the prosecutors proposed to divert subpoenaed material from the exclusive use of the grand jury to that of unauthorized persons were not sufficiently pleaded.

In the second proceeding, In the Matter of the April 1956 Term Grand Jury, C. A. 7, November 13, 1956, Appendix II hereto, the Court held that it would in no way interfere with the scope of grand jury inquiries for purposes of alleged criminal investigations but that sufficient showing was made that voluminous material, theoretically subpoenaed for the jury's use, was actually being diverted to Treasury agents for civil or collateral purposes and that such use should be restrained.

In the proceedings last referred to, Vincent P. Russo, the principal affiant in support of the present motion, argued the matter to the Court of Appeals. In so doing he misrepresented facts to such extent that on November 2, 1955, the Justice Department filed a motion with that Court in which it said:

> "The Government admits and sincerely regrets that certain misstatements of fact were made to the Court on oral argument [by Mr. Russo] on October 17, 1956. The Department of Justice desires to make a full and accurate correction of the record, and the matter is under consideration by the Assistant Attorneys General in charge of the Criminal and Tax Divisions."

In the light of that record, Mr. Russo's ability to make fair and accurate digests, appraisals and summaries of alleged statements of alleged potential witnesses, as he purports to do here, may be doubted. The requirement that the actual affidavits of the prospective witnesses be produced rather than a lawyer's version of what he thinks witnesses might say, has significant impact here.

dence to warrant an indictment of Sauber, Busby or Cain for anything.[5] The claim now is merely that "had the evidence now available been presented [originally] * * * the rulings * * * might conceivably have been altered" (Mo., p. 5).

While the foregoing proceedings were going on, the Treasury, on September 15, 1955, made a jeopardy assessment against respondent Shotwell (Homan) claiming $3,172,000 in taxes, penalties and interest for the years 1944-45-46. Of this, $1,036,000 was asserted for taxes for the years 1945 and 1946, as contrasted with the $286,000 tax deficiency asserted here for those years.

Respondent Shotwell (now named Homan Mfg. Co., Inc.), proceeded in the District Court for an injunction against collection of this assessment on the ground it was arbitrary and capricious. A deposition was taken from Revenue Agent Charles J. Mammel, who made the $3,172,000 assessment, and who necessarily is the Revenue Agent whose opinions and complaints are referred to, or paraphrased, in the Stein affidavit, Ex. A to the present Motion. On June 14, 1956, the District Court, acting on the deposition and other evidentiary material, entered a summary judgment holding that the assessment was "patently arbitrary, capricious and wholly void" (App. III). It found:

> "11. Mammel's determinations were arbitrary, capricious and unlawful in the extreme and it is not necessary to decide whether such actions sprang from malice, incapacity, or a desire to justify the length of time and large amounts of manpower consumed in this investigation, or from a combination of these or other reasons. Mammel suffered a complete mental breakdown on March 19, 1953 and upon cross-examination in February 1956 was unable to recall basic rules of taxation involved in this case and which should have come into play when he made the assessment of September 1955. He also was unable to recall important points developed during the criminal trial of late 1953 to which he should have applied fair judgment in making the 1955 assessment."

A significant fact thus emerges after more than 8 years of Treasury examinations: all of the Government attorneys and revenue agents who, from 1948 through the trial of the case interviewed the witnesses and worked on the case, believed that the witnesses pro and con who testified on the suppression hearing told the essential truth as to the disclosure. (See Howard affidavit, Ex. C., Mo. to Remand.) There were minor, immaterial differences that are the hallmark of honest, as distinguished from rigged, testimony. But in late 1954, an embittered Revenue Agent (Maumel), of questionable mental balance and who subsequently entered an assessment that violated elementary concepts of due process, submitted critical reports and set in motion the train of events that has ended in the instant unprecedented motion. The unanimity of opinion by those who prepared and tried the case that Sauber, Busby and Cain told the essential truth is strong evidence that they did precisely that.

AMPLIFICATION OF REASONS FOR DENIAL OF MOTION

I.

The Government cannot move for a partial new trial in order to validate a conviction already obtained.

We have been unable to find a case in which it has ever been asserted, much less held, that the Government can bolster a criminal judgment of conviction, which has been reversed by a Court of Appeals, by going back into the trial court and supplementing the record. But such is the maneuver here attempted, and on so palpably weak an evidentiary showing that it would be treated with derision were it not advanced in the highest court in the land by counsel occupying distinguished offices.

Strictly speaking, the prosecutors are not endeavoring to place the defendants in double jeopardy. They are attempting something which to us seems worse—they wish to hang on to the original jury verdicts of guilty while trying to patch up the suppression hearing; they are not willing to place the Government in jeopardy of a new trial. A tactic more oppressive and less consonant with the concept that the sovereign may not seek a second "go" at a citizen in criminal proceedings is difficult to imagine.

Even in the notorious prosecution of Fries under the Alien and Sedition Act, Fed. Cas. No. 5126, it was conceded that the Government could not have a new trial, on good or bad grounds, in a criminal case. But here it is contended that this Court, out of hand, may modify the Court of Appeals mandate to the point of virtual reversal, and permit the prosecution to go back to the trial court for the avowed purpose of putting in more evidence to support the conviction already reached in that court. If such procedure be permitted, citizens could be partially retried endlessly until ultimately exhausted or convicted, guilty or innocent.

Rule 33 of the Rules of Criminal Procedure restates the basic proposition, sacred to our law, that only the defendant may move for a new trial. It says:

> "The court may grant a new trial to a defendant if required in the interests of justice."

There is no rule, or practice, permitting the prosecution to move for a new trial, or a partial new trial, save action in the nature of a confession of error (Cf. Mesarosh v. United States, No. 20 this term).

Observe that what is really involved is a ruling by the trial court, after a hearing on legal and factual issues, as to the admissibility of evidence, viz., the prosecution contended it could introduce voluminous material which it had procured through a promise of immunity. It still so contends. The issue is much the same as would arise in a murder trial if the defendant contended that a purported confession had been obtained by coercion. In both instances there is a hearing before the court as to whether the evidence is admissible. Under Rule 41(e) this normally is prior to empaneling of the jury, although it may be had thereafter if the cause is not earlier known.

If it be supposed that this was a murder case instead of an income tax case; that the trial court after hearing evidence, had admitted a supposed confession of murder; and that the Court of Appeals had reversed on the ground that the confession was unconstitutionally obtained, we think the notion that the prosecutor could go into the Supreme Court and ask for a new trial as to the admissibility of the confession because he had new evidence that the confession was not obtained by coercion, would instantly be rejected.

This case is no different simply because it is an income tax, rather than a murder prosecution. The prosecution is here seeking a second chance to convict defendants after failing in its first attempt. Or, more accurately, it is seeking a second chance to try suppression issues which are essential to the validity of the merits portion of the trial. Although this effort to assail defendants a second time is casually presented as a "motion to remand" it is essentially a motion for a partial new trial.

It may be doubted that such iniquitous procedure would ever be presented in the more ordinary fields of criminal law. The reason that the Solicitor General's motion cites no authority would seem to be that the recorded judicial history of the country fails to show any such prior attempt. This is not a proceeding to determine, or to collect taxes. This is a criminal case in which the liberty of citizens is at stake. Zealousness in the collection of taxes may be commendable; overzealousness in criminal prosecution which reduces it to persecution is deplorable.

II.

A new trial cannot be given merely because additional evidence "might conceivably alter" the results.

When Internal Revenue a year ago induced the Solicitor General to seek delay in this Court it was on the ground that it had new evidence which was "in direct conflict" with the original testimony of Busby, Cain and Sauber which "was false in material and vital aspects" (Letter of Chief Counsel of Internal Revenue to H. Brian Holland, December 1, 1955, submitted with Solicitor Sobeloff's letter of December 5, 1955 to the Clerk of this Court). This was tantamount to a charge of perjury. Our letter of December 9, 1955 to the Clerk denied this assertion and no evidence "in direct conflict" is now tendered.

When the Solicitor wrote to the Court on June 1, 1956, requesting further delay, the charge had been modified:

> "* * * the additional evidence developed by the Internal Revenue Service suggested the possibility that there might have been perjured testimony * * *."

Our answering letter contested this.

Now the amended Motion to Remand (p. 5) asserts only that > "* * * had the evidence now available been submitted to the lower courts the rulings under review might conceivably have been altered * * *."

It is apparent that Internal Revenue Service has placed the Solicitor General in steady retrogression. A year ago Internal Revenue was claiming perjury. But after an additional exhaustive investigation, grand jury and otherwise, there has been no recantation of testimony and there is no claim of perjury.

It nearly always is possible to assert that a modicum of additional evidence, pro or con, might "conceivably have altered" a prior result, or, as really is the claim here, have furnished an additional argument for the same result in the trial court. Indeed new trials on essentially the same evidence frequently lead to different results. But by none of the established rules is such a possibility recognized as grounds for a new or further hearing. If such were the law, there would never be an end to litigation. Many cases might be cited, but the applicable rules and authorities are well summarized in U. S. v. Johnson, 142 F. 2d 588 (C. A. 7),[6] in which Judge Minton reviewed many cases and said (p. 592):

> "Having decided that there was no recantation or false swearing by Goldstein, the District Court then considered the case as any other motion for a new trial on newly discovered evidence would be considered. On such consideration, the court found that the rule for such motions 'has never been better nor more succinctly stated than' in Berry v. State of Georgia, 10 Ga. 511, which he quoted as follows:
> "'Upon the following points there seems to be a pretty general concurrence of authority, viz: that it

6. The Johnson case had a long history in which there were at least two unsuccessful efforts by the defendant to obtain a new trial. The matter was finally closed by this court's opinion in 327 U. S. 106. This court approved the rules we quote in the text.

is incumbent on a party who asks for a new trial, on the ground of newly discovered evidence, to satisfy The Court, 1st. That the evidence has come to his knowledge since the trial. 2d. That it was not owing to the want of due diligence that it did not come sooner. 3d. That it is so material that it would probably produce a different verdict, if the new trial were granted. 4th. That it is not cumulative only—viz.:—speaking to facts, in relation to which there was evidence on the trial. 5th. That the affidavit of the witness himself should be produced, or its absence accounted for. And 6th, a new trial will not be granted, if the only object of the testimony is to impeach the character or credit of a witness.'

"This is the general rule applicable where there has been no showing of recantation or false swearing and the effect of the newly discovered evidence is considered in its relation to a possible new trial. This rule has been followed in the Federal cases and is of almost universal application among the States. Johnson v. United States, 10 Cir., 32 F. 2d 127, 130; Kithcart v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 8 Cir., 119 F. 2d 497, 500; Weiss v. United States, 5 Cir., 122 F. 2d 675, 691; Evans v. United States, 10 Cir., 122 F. 2d 461, 469; Wagner v. United States, 9 Cir., 118 F. 2d 801, 802; Prisament v. United States, 5 Cir., 96 F. 2d 865, 866; 23 Corpus Juris Secundum, Criminal Law, § 1461; 39 American Jurisprudence, § 165. In the application of this rule, the District Court considered whether the so-called newly discovered evidence was cumulative, whether it was diligently obtained and presented, and whether some of it was merely impeaching. The court found that much of the evidence was subject to one or the other of these infirmities and that on the whole it did not meet the standards of newly discovered evidence warranting a new trial. In this we cannot say, as a matter of law, that the trial court erred."

Legally, as we show under our next point, the additional evidence could not change the result—the disclosure was timely regardless of whether made in January or July 1948, or at some intermediate date. Moreover the timeliness of the disclosure appears in bold relief from the fact no independent initiation of investigation ever did occur—when agents from Internal Revenue's Intelligence unit possibly might have been preparing to initiate an investigation they found that agents from the Audit Section already were busy verifying or checking on the disclosure. A further hearing might supply minor bits of evidence but it could not alter those essential facts that are fatal to any contention that this disclosure was untimely. And when the Motion is examined closely it will be seen that the Solicitor General does not assert that the additional evidence will, or should, or probably should, lead to an "altered result," merely that it conceivably could do so. As much could be said in any case.

III.

The legal theory of the motion, viz., that the "timeliness" date under the voluntary disclosure policy was fixed by date of receipt of an asserted clue or "scent" which ultimately might or would lead to an investigation, was conceded to be erroneous in the District Court and was not presented to, or passed upon, by the Court of Appeals.

Counsel have made a drastic but unannounced, and perhaps unrealized, shift in legal theory that is partially explained in our footnote 3. The motion is presented as dependent solely upon assertedly new facts—actually it is based upon a new and erroneous legal theory applied to old facts which theory was expressly disavowed by the Government in the trial court and never heard of in the Court of Appeals.

It well may be that with a four year lapse of time and with changes of Government counsel, the present brief writers have overlooked what occurred at the suppression hearing; but the record is clear, not only that their present theory as to when the timeliness date fell (and would bar a subsequent disclosure) is erroneous, but that is not open to them. Counsel also may not be familiar with the detail of the record which indisputably shows that Intelligence did not get a "scent" on June 21, 1948. (See our footnote 3.)

Unless the new legal theory is sound, and may now be asserted, the entire motion is pointless—the prosecutors ask that the case go back so that they may attempt to prove that the disclosure was made in July, 1948 rather than in January-March, 1948. But that is immaterial if a disclosure in July would still have been "timely." Even if the Intelligence Agents had gotten a clue or "scent" on June 21, 1948, and even if defendants had thought such "scent" might lead to investigation, there was no "initiation" of an investigation that would have prevented a valid subsequent disclosure. The Treasury had announced:

> "Now we have said that in order to be considered voluntary, a disclosure must be made before we have initiated an investigation in the case. Therefore, it is essential that we define 'the initiation of investigation.'
> "The mere record of a name does not mean that an investigation has been initiated. The fact is that examining officers throughout the country have thousands of names or possible leads. To deny the existence of a voluntary disclosure merely because we have a name would be comparable to regarding the telephone book as a dossier of tax evaders.
>
> "An investigation is initiated when a special agent, an internal revenue agent, a deputy collector, or other Bureau officer, is assigned a return for examination, or where an investigating officer has requested advice of appropriate officers of the Bureau with respect to the filing of a return or the payment of taxes.
> "The time of disclosure and the time an investigation begins are, therefore, matters which can be ascertained with complete objectivity and certainty, thus protecting both the Government and the taxpayer from decisions based on guesswork or other vague circumstances. To assure adherence to this principle, the Bureau stands ready at all times where a dispute may arise as to the time of a disclosure and the time an investigation was initiated to open its records in that regard.

"We are not concerned with the motivating force behind an individual's deciding to come in and talk to us about his evasion. If he 'gets religion' before we have done anything, he will not be prosecuted." (Treasury release of May 14, 1947, consisting of address, "Tax Frauds and Voluntary Disclosure," by Chief Counsel of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, J. P. Wenchel, R. 3132, 3136.)

The foregoing definition of "initiation of investigation" became known as the "Wenchel doctrine" or "Wenchel objective test," was so referred to at the suppression hearing herein (R. 378, 433, 441), AND WAS CONCEDED TO BE CONTROLLING BY THE GOVERNMENT (R. 441, 445). THAT CONCESSION, AND IT WAS A CORRECT ONE, STILL STANDS. Getting a clue or a "scent" as to Shotwell, at any time while investigating Lubben, obviously would not be the "initiation of investigation" of Shotwell under any construction of the Wenchel doctrine.

Shortly after the widespread release of the quoted Wenchel speech, Treasury Secretary Snyder made a further release on May 25, 1947, in which he said (portion in parentheses and emphasis ours):

"Prior to such action (initiation of investigation as defined in the Wenchel speech) within the Bureau, a taxpayer may make a voluntary disclosure and escape criminal prosecution even though his name may appear in an inactive file of suspects." (R. 3141.)

It is crystal clear that the Treasury's own definition of "initiation of investigation," precluded treating the mere obtaining of a clue or "scent" as to a possible violator as the initiation of investigation which would bar a subsequent disclosure. Even if persons within the Treasury had Shotwell on a list of suspects as to whom it had a "scent," Shotwell and its officers were still free to accept the Treasury's offers for the making of a voluntary disclosure until such time as investigation was actually initiated.

The original prosecutor recognized that merely obtaining a clue or "scent" would not constitute "initiation of investigation" within the meaning of the disclosure policy. At the suppression hearing there was incidental evidence which showed that supposedly in March 1948 the New York agents who were investigating Lubben obtained information which gave a clue to Shotwell. Prosecutor Edward J. Ryan admitted that this evidence did not tend to prove the "initiation of investigation" or to establish a so-called "timeliness date". He said:

> "* * * The Government did not offer evidence of this statement that Mr. Toohig received from an informant for the purpose of indicating that the express activity in New York represented a commencement of the investigation in this case for the reason that that appears to be preexcluded by the Wenchel doctrine. That was offered for the purpose of demonstrating that eventually in spite of this disclosure the Government was going to be examining these corporate books and records. That was the purpose for offering it. That is the reason it was never implemented with anything else, and there was never any contention made it was transmitted to Chicago at all. There was no such action with respect to it before this alleged disclosure such as would satisfy the Wenchel doctrine. The purpose of the Wenchel doctrine is very apparent. It was to establish an objective test, an objective break-off > point that wouldn't be affected by what the taxpayer knew or what his motives were, but just a time when after which there could be no disclosure, so that it would eliminate those arguments.

> "That certainly must be apparent from its very language." (R. 441.)

With respect to the variations in the testimony as to the dates of disclosure events in January, February and March 1948, the Government, pinning its case on a believed "timeliness date" of December 16, 1947 (which date has long since been abandoned), held that these differences were immaterial, or certainly of no serious consequence. Prosecutor Ryan said:

> "When I mention the dates of the alleged disclosure, I want to say that I don't think it makes any difference whether it was January, February or March. I think those dates are after December 16th, and apparently nobody here made any record of when it was." (R. 445.)

In sum, we find that the prosecutors are now asserting a legal theory, viz., that the obtaining of a clue constituted "initiation of investigation", which is squarely contrary to the official Treasury pronouncements on the subject and was expressly disavowed in the trial court. The fact that the disavowal was as to the asserted March 1948 clue rather than one that is now mistakenly asserted as of June 21, 1948, does not alter the fact that the whole clue or "scent" theory was disavowed by the Government and was admitted to be "preexcluded" by the Wenchel doctrine.

We submit that it is not properly open to the present prosecutors to advance a legal theory which the Government not only did not advance, but denied, below (Helvering v. Minnesota Tea Co., 296 U. S. 378, 380; Forged Steel Sales Co. v. Lewellyn, 251 U. S. 502, 515). Additionally, it does not lie in the mouth of the prosecution at this remote state in the proceedings to complain of lack of specificity as to some of the events connected with the disclosure and the compilation of figures, when it took the position in the trial court that pinpointing of such dates and sequence of events made no difference. Defendants in criminal cases should not be continuously harassed with new theories, be they good or bad.

IV.

The evidence is not new.

Under Point 4 of our "Summary of Reasons" we have shown that the principal facts on which the Motion is hinged, i. e., the telephone call of June 21, 1948, and the fact that the summary sheets were not prepared until July 1948, were clear at the suppression hearing and the hearing on the merits.

In addition to these items, Inspector Yaden's affidavit of December 1, 1955, says (a) that at a luncheon meeting at the Chicago Atheletic Club sometime between July 21 and July 30, 1948, Cain and Busby had figures of the unreported over-ceiling sales received by Shotwell, which they offered to turn over to Sauber or Group Supervisor Johnson; (b) that the Shotwell personnel which helped put together the final recapitulations in July 1948 did so at the Belden-Stratford Hotel in Chicago; (c) that neither Sauber nor Johnson made any record or contemporaneous memorandum of their meetings with Cain or Busby in 1948. The Russo affidavit adds (d) that Edward T. Urban, an officer of Close & Co., a Chicago candy manufacturer which also had received black market premium money from Lubben, informed Russo that at a luncheon meeting in July 1948 with defendants Huebner and Sullivan, "there was discussed a contemplated purchase by the Shotwell Mfg. Co., Close & Co., and others who had received over-ceiling currency payments from Lubben," of Lubben's companies, for the purpose of getting control of, and destroying, the Lubben books.

These allegations and affidavits are interesting for what they do not say as much as for what they say:

It is not shown when any of these alleged items first came to the attention of the Government. The recitals that undisclosed witnesses told Yaden and Russo things in 1955 or 1956 do not negate the fact that the same things were told to other Government investigators in 1952, 1953 or earlier and are no fulfillment of the inflexible rule that it must be shown "That the evidence has come to [movant's] knowledge since the trial." (Cf. U. S. v. Johnson, supra.)

The omission of such showing is doubly significant because the Yaden affidavit is the same one that was attached to the Solicitor General's letter of December 6, 1955, and was attacked by our letter of December 9, 1955, as displaying nothing of consequence that was new. If the prosecutors could have filed a supplemental affidavit saying that these things were not known to the Treasury or Justice Departments at the time of the suppression hearing, or the hearing on the merits, or the appeal proceedings, we may be sure they would have done so.

Although the motion states that it was "only as a result of the full-scale investigation begun in April 1955 into possible misconduct" by Internal Revenue personnel in Chicago that "this new evidence was discovered" it is apparent that the Solicitor General has permitted himself to overstate the case:

We have seen that the telephone call of June 21, 1948 and the slow process of assembling data for the final recapitulations which were made in July were repeatedly inquired into by well trained, competent Government counsel of unquestioned integrity at the suppression hearing and the hearing on the merits.

The same is true of the fact that neither Sauber nor Johnson made any contemporaneous memoranda of their meeting or meetings with Cain and Busby. Prosecutor Ryan was well aware of that and, as we have seen, mentioned that fact in arguing the suppression motion (R. 445).

It may be that the Government did not know in 1952 or 1953 that Sauber and Johnson met Busby and Cain for lunch at the Chicago Athletic Club and did not know that the final recapitulation figures were put together in an office which Cain, a real-estate man and part owner of the Belden-Stratford Hotel, maintained and regularly used in that hotel. Or it well may be that it did know. The record does not show and certainly the motion makes no positive showing. We do know that Sauber was cleared of administrative wrongdoing in meeting Busby and Sauber for lunch. But the places of these meetings were, and are, immaterial. The places were normal and by no means sinister. Defendants have never attempted to conceal these places. Indeed at the suppression hearing defense counsel asked Sauber if he had any talk with Busby or Cain outside his office and Sauber replied, "I may have. I can't recall any particular time" (R. 302). The matter was not further pursued.

If there was anything wrong about having a meeting in the Chicago Athletic Club or in assembling the top echelon of Shotwell people in Cain's office at the Belden-Stratford we may be sure that in the year since the Yaden affidavit was filed here, and promptly attacked in our reply letter as being inconsequential, some additional or supplemental showing would have been made.

Finally, it is said that Urban of Close Candy Co., which had received over-ceiling payments from Lubben, had a meeting with defendants Huebner and Sullivan in July 1948 at which there was discussed a proposal for a group of companies that had dealt with Lubben to acquire his company for the purpose of destroying its books. Under our next point we shall show the peculiarities of Mr. Russo's affidavit in this respect, but whatever the Urban conversation may have been, is it new? The failure of the Government to make a showing of when this alleged episode first came to its attention is, we believe, no oversight.

We respectfully submit that as a motion for a partial new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence the instant motion wholly fails to show the essential ingredient of "newness".

As to diligence it may be sufficient to observe that the Stein affidavit discloses that "certainly" as early as "the middle of 1955" a Treasury "suspicion" that the disclosure did not occur in March, 1948, had become "firmly fixed". However, the case remained in the Court of Appeals for more than three months after this and not a word was said to that court. It is a fair assumption that it was decided to gamble on the outcome in that court on the record as it then stood. On December 6, 1955 the Yaden affidavit was presented here and a motion to remand was promised at an early date. It did not come until nearly a year later. This is the precise reverse of diligence.

V.

The motion is not supported by the affidavits of the purported witness.

The motion is supported only by conclusory and hearsay affidavits by prosecuting counsel and by that of a Treasury detective—not a single affidavit of a witness competent to testify to a single fact is attached, whereas the uniform, strictly applied, and well known rule is that "the affidavit of the witness himself should be produced, or its absence accounted for." (U. S. v. Johnson, 142 F. 2d 588, supra.)

The books abound with cases in which the rule requiring witness affidavits has been enforced against convicted private citizens who sought a new trial. Would it not be a cruel and repulsive system of justice which would excuse the Government, better equipped as it is to conduct investigations and to obtain affidavits, from giving the citizen, when it wants a new trial (assuming arguendo it ever may have one), what it demands from him when he prays the same relief?

There are portions of the affidavits of both Yaden and Russo that are utterly unfit for any judicial proceeding involving the liberty of citizens, much less one in the Supreme Court—"* * * witnesses under interrogation by me * * * have given statements * * *." That is the anonymous informer system carried to the nth degree.

On the other hand both the Yaden and Russo affidavits say that Internal Revenue Group Supervisor Johnson gave an affidavit or made a sworn statement, but the document is not attached. Nor is that of Special Agent Sam Krane from whom the Treasury could readily procure an affidavit.

Thus the Court is presented with carefully filtered characterizations of stories by anonymous and concealed informants on the one hand, and on the other, the same kind of argumentative hearsay with respect to witnesses from whom it is indisputable that affidavits could be produced.

Conclusions, arguments and characterizations permeate the affidavits:

Yaden says that the Belden-Stratford meeting in July 1948 was "for the express purpose of preparing the underlying documents from which there could be developed a purported voluntary disclosure", etc. The key words in that quotation express complex conclusions rather than facts and display a woeful ignorance of what a "voluntary disclosure", was. It was not necessary to "develop figures" from which to make a disclosure—the disclosure was the act of coming forward and identifying oneself as having filed an erroneous return. (See footnote 2 hereof.) The cooperation with the Government in getting an accurate return came afterward and as a consequence of the disclosure. And use of the sweeping and undefined phrase "underlying documents" is inexcusable. The record shows without dispute that the "underlying documents" in this case were shipping tickets, invoices and the like as well as books of account. The documents that admittedly were prepared in July at the Belden-Stratford Hotel were "summaries" or "recapitulations" prepared from underlying documents that had been gathered over a period of months.

The Russo affidavit is even worse: In one sweeping sentence (p. 18) Mr. Russo wraps up the whole case:

> "From statements of fact * * * and from facts and circumstances already in the record, it appears that prior to June 21, 1948 when Special Agent Sam Krane * * * requested, among other things, certain records evidencing shipments of merchandise for which no invoices were rendered * * *, no disclosure, voluntary or otherwise, had been made * * *."

This statement assumes that if a disclosure had not been made by June 21, 1948 that one thereafter would be untimely. As we have seen, this is incorrect.

The statement that no disclosure had been made by June 21 is nothing more than Mr. Russo's opinion as to everything in a 3000 page record plus his own secret investigation. Nevertheless it is boldly and unqualifiedly sworn to as a fact and is made in the face of uncontradicted and unrecanted testimony to the contrary.

There is only one statement of fact in the entire sentence and that statement is demonstrably false: Mr. Russo says that on June 21, 1948 Special Agent Krane asked for records "evidencing shipments of merchandise for which no invoices were rendered". But the request to Krane to get information from Shotwell is in the record (R. 3158) and so is his report (R. 3161). Instead of seeking evidence as to shipments without invoices he went to get invoices (and he got them). He was asked to procure

> "#1—All sales invoices to General Confections, Hillsdale, New Jersey, and 40 West 170th Street, New York City * * *
> #2—Same to Eatsum Foods, 19 Rector Street, New York City" (and certain warehouse receipts and mortgage papers.) (R. 3159.)

Krane's report (R. 3161) shows he asked for, and got, these documents. There never has been the faintest doubt of these facts. Mr. Russo's statement reverses the truth and shows how unreliable are his summaries of "facts and circumstances". (See footnote 4.) We think the reason for this misstatement, which could hardly be one of oversight, is obvious—a routine call, such as Krane's really was, to check invoices while investigating another taxpayer excites no curiosity, whereas an investigation as to shipments without invoices might excite curiosity and would give greater color to the new and unsound "clue" theory.

Russo next purports to describe "information" and "assertions" he says he received from Urban, an officer of Close and Company, pertaining to a discussion in the first three weeks of July as to a possible purchase of Lubben's company for the purpose of destruction of its records. Russo says this did not relate to the acquisition of Lubben's books for the purpose of accumulating data to be used in the making of the Shotwell disclosure. This hearsay recital is subject to all of the vices we have heretofore pointed out. It may be observed that while he tries to create a sinister atmosphere Mr. Russo fails to say whether this asserted proposal supposedly emanated from Lubben, from Urban or someone else. In any event, he does not claim (and he would if he possibly could), that any of the defendants here initiated this proposal and he does not claim that anyone did anything about it. Mr. Russo seeks to draw the inference that because Sullivan and Huebner failed to agree to buy Lubben's company so that they could use its books in preparing further figures in pursuance of the disclosure, that no disclosure in fact had been made. The non sequitur is obvious.

Finally Russo says that "from Busby's testimony in the record it appears that he and members of his staff compiled the data in Government exhibits 186 and 189A, B, C, D and E (the alleged disclosure documents) from the first of February through the first of June, 1948, or thereabouts. From statements of fact" made to him by anonymous witnesses it "appears that Government exhibits 186 and 189 A, B, C, D and E were compiled during the space of a day or two * * * in late July 1948." This is either a play on the word "compiled" or a deliberate misrepresentation. The specified summary exhibits admittedly were prepared in the space of a short time. The record has always been clear on that point. However, the data that is reflected by them was collected, or "compiled", over a considerable period of time and there has been no dispute about that (R. 2812-7, 2837). Merely because the summary documents were not put together until late July does not tend to prove that the disclosure had not been made much earlier.

We realize that this Court is not the place to argue facts. Nevertheless, we, and the Court, are faced with a motion which purports to have a factual background. If that background is examined it will be seen that it consists of argumentative and conclusory hearsay and, in some instances, contains demonstrable misstatements. It endeavors to create the appearance of contradiction of prior evidence but it does not contradict. And that fact we believe we are entitled to make clear to the Court.

In any event, examination of these opinion and hearsay affidavits demonstrates the wisdom of the rule the Government always applies to citizens who seek a new trial on the grounds of newly discovered evidence, namely, affidavits or sworn testimony of witnesses competent to testify to the facts must be produced and not the opinions and conclusions of lawyers and detectives, whether they be well or ill-founded. The affidavits of Yaden, Russo and McNelis well could be stricken. Certainly they cannot be given the weight necessary to subject citizens to further criminal proceedings.

VI.

If the motion has any standing at all it is presented to the wrong Court.

We think that the motion is bad on its face and should be denied. However, if a motion of this kind can be made anywhere it should have been made in the Court of Appeals. In the case culminating as U. S. v. Johnson, 327 U. S. 106, there were two separate motions for a new trial made while the case was pending in this Court. The procedural steps are briefly outlined in the early paragraphs of 327 U. S. 106 and are more fully stated in 149 F. 2d 31. There as here a motion for a new trial, or a motion to supplement the record with additional information alleged to show that a Government witness had testified falsely, was presented to this Court while a petition for certiorari was pending. This Court refused to entertain the motion but did agree to withhold consideration of the petition for certiorari until the defendants could apply to the Court of Appeals. Much the same procedure had earlier occurred after this Court's first decision in the Johnson case (319 U. S. 503) in which a motion based upon new evidence was presented here pending a petition for rehearing. This Court denied the motion for stay of mandate without prejudice to the consideration of a similar motion by the Court of Appeals. In other words, in each instance the movant was sent to the Court of Appeals to make his prima facie show for a new trial or for the reception of additional evidence. And that Court in each instance decided whether its then outstanding mandate should be modified to permit the reception of additional evidence in the trial court. (Johnson never did obtain a new trial.)

If we are correct in our view that a motion of the kind now made cannot be made anywhere, the motion should be denied unconditionally. On the other hand, if this Court should believe there is some color to the motion it nevertheless should not be granted but be denied conditionally with leave to present it to the Court of Appeals. Granting the motion outright here would result in a direction to the trial court to receive new evidence in the original case and would deprive defendants of their right to test the legal and factual sufficiency of the motion.

CONCLUSION.

When certiorari was sought over a year ago it was on the basis that the case presented a question of law which was "of considerable importance to the revenue, for, although the [voluntary] policy has been abandoned" the Internal Revenue Service asserted that there were then between 60 to 70 pending cases in which a question under the former voluntary disclosure policy either had been or could be raised (Pet. p. 20). In our Brief in Opposition (p. 14) we questioned whether there were 60 or 70 pending cases presenting a question like the one here and asserted (p. 23) that under this Court's usual doctrines (Cf. Rice v. Sioux City Memorial Park, 349 U. S. 70) certiorari should not be granted to determine a question no longer of public importance. Examination of the reported cases since that date reveals only one District Court case (U. S. v. Pack, D. C. Del.) and that case turned on quite different facts. It is, therefore, now apparent, if it was not apparent a year ago, that the petition for certiorari does not show a case warranting review.

The Government waited until the last day before the statute of limitations ran before indicting these defendants in 1952. The matter has been held in this Court for a year longer than is normal. We are now, in late 1956, talking about tax events of 1945 and 1946 and disclosure events of 1948. Such lengthy and leisurely prosecution is punishing and exhausting.

The Shotwell Company has been unable, and so long as the criminal case is pending, will be unable to make any civil settlement of its asserted tax liabilities for any year after 1944. The individual defendants, and a corporation in which the defendant Cain is a principal stockholder, have been unable to make any settlement of tax liabilities asserted against them for numerous years since 1946 and will be unable to do so as long as this case is pending, for the Treasury successfully opposes bringing any of those matters to trial in the Tax Court (See recitals in App. II hereto).

If the motion to remand and the petition for certiorari be denied we believe it is doubtful if this case will ever be retried in the District Court. But if it should be retried, defendants will have an opportunity to establish their innocence, or in any event to learn where they stand and bring some order out of their chaotic affairs.

On the other hand, if the motion to remand be allowed and further proceedings take place in the District Court, supplementary to, but in support of the present convictions, and if the Government should prevail, the old record will again have to be reviewed by the Court of Appeals, not merely for error in the supposed new hearing, but to dispose of questions not originally passed because, in the light of its disposition of the suppression issue, the Court of Appeals believed it was "unnecessary to express an opinion as to whether the remaining evidence on the trial below did or did not establish defendant's guilt, or to pass upon the other errors relied upon." Such a path would be a long, long one.

We respectfully pray that the motion to remand and the petition for certiorari be denied.

APPENDIX I.

Full Administrative Charges Dated December 2, 1955, Against Ernest J. Sauber Insofar as They Relate to This Case. After Hearing No Finding Was Made Against Sauber on These Charges.

Charge III Failure to render honest, fair, and conscientious service in connection with the income tax matters of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated for the years 1944 to 1949, inclusive; and Cain and Culhane, Incorporated, and Byron A. and Sally T. Cain, for the years 1947 to 1949, inclusive. Specifically,

1. On four separate occasions, you fixed the date of the alleged disclosure in the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, income tax case, for the years 1944, 1945 and 1946, as occurring in March, 1948, when in fact, the taxpayer did not furnish the Internal Revenue Service any information bearing upon, or relative to, its unreported black market income for the years 1944 to 1946, inclusive, until July, 1948, after the government had uncovered this source of unreported income and had contacted the taxpayer. The four occasions referred to above were (1) in an interview, as Chief Field Deputy, with Internal Revenue Agent Charles Mammel on October 18, 1950; (2) in a memorandum, written as Assistant Collector, to Special Agent Sam Krane, dated October 16, 1951; (3) in sworn testimony, as District Director, at a hearing on the motion to suppress the evidence in the Shotwell case, in the U. S. District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, Chicago, Illinois, on November 13, 1952; and (4) in sworn testimony, as District Director, before representatives of the Inspection Service, on July 20, 1955.

2. You, as Chief Field Deputy, failed to make notes, diary entries, or memoranda in connection with the alleged disclosure in the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, income tax case for the years 1944, 1945 and 1946, prior to October 16, 1951, when you, as Assistant Collector, furnished a memorandum with respect thereto to Special Agent Sam Krane.

3. You, as Chief Field Deputy, failed to refer the alleged disclosure in the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, income tax case for the years 1944, 1945 and 1946, to the office of the Internal Revenue Agent in Charge or the Special Agent in Charge, through proper administrative channels.

4. You, as Chief Field Deputy, failed to notify your superiors in the office of the Collector of Internal Revenue of the alleged disclosure in the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, income tax case for the years 1944, 1945 and 1946.

5. You, as Chief Field Deputy, participated in a luncheon meeting with Byron A. Cain, President of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, and Leon Busby, the company accountant, at their expense, at the Chicago Athletic Club in July, 1948, for the prearranged purpose of discussing The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, income tax case for the years 1944, 1945 and 1946. You failed to make any record or report of this meeting and failed to report this matter to your superiors.

6. You, as Chief Field Deputy, induced Group Supervisor, Ralph R. Johnson, Office of the Internal Revenue Agent in Charge, to attend the luncheon described in the preceding specification without the knowledge or consent of Johnson's superiors who had official responsibility for the investigation and determination of the tax liability of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated.

7. You, as Chief Field Deputy, withheld information from Internal Revenue Agent Charles Mammel respecting the luncheon meeting when you were questioned by him on October 18, 1950 relative to the various contacts that you had with officials and representatives of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, in connection with the alleged disclosure in the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, income tax case for the years 1944, 1945 and 1946.

8. You, as Assistant Collector, failed to include information relative to the Chicago Athletic Club luncheon meeting in a memorandum that you prepared on October 16, 1951, at the request of Special Agent Sam Krane, relative to the various contacts that you had with officials and representatives of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, in connection with the alleged disclosure in the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, income tax case for the years 1944, 1945 and 1946.

9. You, as District Director, authorized the rejection of Internal Revenue Agent Charles Mammel's request for travel authority to Palm Springs, Los Angeles and San Diego, California, to conduct an investigation in those places in connection with the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, and related income tax cases for the years 1944 to 1946, inclusive.

10. You as District Director, ordered the complete removal of Internal Revenue Agent Charles Mammel from the Byron A. and Sally T. Cain, the Cain and Culhane, Incorporated, and the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, income tax cases for the years 1947 to 1949, inclusive, although Mr. Mammel, from February, 1949, had been the principal revenue agent in charge of the audit features of the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, case for 1944 to 1946, inclusive, and had a most comprehensive knowledge of the facts and circumstances involving the taxpayers. You further forbade the revenue agents assigned thereto to discuss or communicate with Mr. Mammel, thereby depriving the Service and its agents from knowledge and direction available by reason of Mr. Mammel's familiarity with the case.

11. You, as District Director, withheld information from Assistant United States Attorney General Edward J. Ryan of the luncheon meeting when he originally questioned you on October 23, 1952 relative to the various contacts that you had had with officials and representatives of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, in connection with the alleged disclosure in the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, income tax case for the years 1944, 1945 and 1946.

12. You, as District Director, intimidated Internal Revenue Agent Paul T. Seto during a conference in your office on April 7, 1955 by indignantly charging that Mr. Seto's report was the worst report you had seen or had knowledge of, and that the agent who wrote it was incompetent and not fit to be an employee of the Internal Revenue Service and was a case for a psychiatrist. You further stated that Mr. Seto, in violation of your orders, was consulting and working together with Internal Revenue Agent Charles Mammel, who as stated in specification 10, above, had substantial knowledge of the facts in the case and was in a position to furnish direction and advice to Mr. Seto, in the best interests of the Internal Revenue Service. You further accused Mr. Seto of working for the Inspection Service of the Internal Revenue Service instead of the District Director's office. Such statements of intimidation by a superior officer toward an employee under his direction and control, who was attempting to discharge his duties honestly and faithfully, were contrary to the best interests of the Internal Revenue Service and were designed to impede Mr. Seto's investigation of the Byron A. and Sally T. Cain income tax case for the years 1947 to 1949, inclusive. At the conclusion of said conference you issued instructions to the Chief of the Audit Division to detail Revenue Agent Seto to the Office Audit Branch, thus further intimidating Mr. Seto by removing him from his usual assignment of field audit work.

13. On November 23, 1952, as District Director, you testified under oath that you told Special Agent Krane everything you knew about the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated case when, in fact, you failed to tell Mr. Krane about the Chicago Athletic Club luncheon described in specification 5, above; and you represented that you were first contacted by Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, in March 1948 when, in fact, no attempt was made by the taxpayer to bring to the attention of the Internal Revenue Service its unreported income for the years 1944 to 1946, inclusive, until July 1948.

14. On July 20, 1955, as District Director, you testified before representatives of the Inspection Service that the luncheon meeting at the Chicago Athletic Club described in specification 5, above, took place at the time that the returns of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, were being transferred from Group Supervisor Ralph Johnson to Group Supervisor Raymond Williams, that is, about February of 1949, whereas, in truth and in fact, the said luncheon meeting took place in July of 1948.

15. On July 20, 1955, as District Director, you testified before representatives of the Inspection Service that, after receiving a telephone inquiry from a representative of the taxpayer, you called Group Supervisor Johnson to inquire as to the delay, and that Group Supervisor Johnson explained that the failure to initiate an investigation with respect to the tax liabilities of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, for the years 1944 to 1946, inclusive, was because you erred in identifying the taxpayer as "Shotwell Candy Company." Contrary to this statement, Group Supervisor Johnson contends he never made such explanation to you.

16. On July 20, 1955, as District Director, you testified before representatives of the Inspection Service that you had never advised Group Supervisor Ralph Johnson that representatives of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, had made or were attempting to make a voluntary disclosure. In conflict with this statement, it has been asserted by Group Supervisor Johnson that you did advise him, respecting the tax liability of Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Incorporated, that the taxpayer desired to make a voluntary disclosure.

17. On October 4, 1955, as District Director, you testified before representatives of the Inspection Service that a check for $50.00 drawn payable to you by Cain and Culhane, Incorporated, for a dinner in behalf of a retiring Internal Revenue Service employee, was returned to Byron A. Cain because the dinner was oversubscribed and there were no facilities available to accommodate additional guests. However, when first explaining this transaction to Group Supervisor Ned Klien in May or June, 1955, you stated that after the check had been returned because Mr. Cain found he was unable to attend the dinner, you subsequently received cash or a check in the amount of $50.00 from Mr. Cain.

APPENDIX II.

For the Seventh Circuit.

No. 11861. SEPTEMBER TERM, 1956, SEPTEMBER SESSION, 1956.

IN THE MATTER OF THE APRIL 1956 TERM GRAND JURY.

BYRON A. CAIN and SALLY CAIN, ET AL., Appellants,
vs.
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Appellee.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division.

November 13, 1956.

Before LINDLEY, SWAIM and SCHNACKENBERG, Circuit Judges.

SCHNACKENBERG, Circuit Judge. On July 27, 1956, Byron A. Cain and Sally Cain, John H. Cain as Trustee of Cain Trust No. 1, a partnership, Harold E. Sullivan, Frank J. Huebner, Uptown Federal Savings & Loan Association of Chicago, Homan Mfg. Co., Inc., a corporation, and Cain & Culhane, Inc., a corporation, filed notice of appeal to this court from an order entered by the district court on July 18, 1956, dismissing their verified petition. The court's action was taken upon a motion of the United States of America, which filed no answer to the petition.

Allegations of pertinent facts set forth in said petition which, for the purpose of this proceeding, are accepted as true, are as briefly as possible now set forth.

In 1948 the treasury department began an investigation of Shotwell Manufacturing Company, a corporation (sometimes herein referred to as Shotwell)[1] and Byron A. Cain, Frank J. Huebner and Harold E. Sullivan, its officers. That investigation was being continued when the petition herein was filed. Shotwell furnished to treasury agents its records and suitable accommodations for the agents at its offices, and expended about $20,000 in making the services of its auditors available to said agents to assist the treasury's investigation, which extended also into the personal affairs of said Cain, Sullivan and Huebner.

Shotwell, Cain, Sullivan and Huebner were indicted on two counts on March 14, 1952, for allegedly wilfully and knowingly attempting to defeat and evade a large part of the income taxes due and owing by Shotwell to the United States of America for the calendar years 1945 and 1946, in violation of 26 U.S.C.A. § 145(b), in that defendants filed and caused to be filed false and fraudulent tax returns for said corporation. In a trial before a jury, defendants were convicted. On July 15, 1955, we reversed the judgment of conviction and remanded the case (United States v. Shotwell Manufacturing Company, et al., 225 F. 2d 394), with instructions to sustain a seasonably made motion by the defendants to suppress certain evidence, and to re-try the case.[2]

At the beginning of the year 1954 (after the trial of the criminal case), the treasury department commenced a new and complete audit and investigation of Shotwell's affairs and those of its officers for 1947 and subsequent years. Shotwell furnished space where its records were made available to the treasury agents.

1. Now known as Homan Mfg. Co., Inc., a corporation and hereinafter referred to as Homan or Shotwell.

2. Petition to the United States Supreme Court for certiorari is now pending.

On or about June 9, 1954, the then district director of internal revenue issued a departmental subpoena to Homan "In the Matter of the Tax Liability of Homan Mfg. Co. for the years 1944, 1945 and 1946", calling for all books, documents, work papers, etc., prepared and used at any date by: first, Frank DelMonte, former cost accountant of Shotwell; second, Busby and Oury, certified public accountants working for Shotwell; and third, all persons and organizations, for Shotwell, in connection with sales by said company in said years.

About July 1, 1954, Shotwell (Homan) delivered to treasury agents books and records covering transactions during the 1940's for examination, constituting a van load of papers, all of which were minutely examined by revenue agents, who made copies of those which they considered relevant, and which documents were returned to Shotwell in late 1955.[3]

Sundry records of Shotwell for the years 1947 to 1952 were called for by a subpoena issued by the acting district director about October 6, 1954. However, said records were not delivered by Shotwell because, among other reasons, Shotwell and its officers were advised and informed that said documents had been examined repeatedly by agents of the treasury and could no longer be called for re-examination under the internal revenue code,[4] constituted preparatory analyses of possible evidence to be adduced at the criminal trial and otherwise could not lawfully and constitutionally be subpoenaed.

3. However, the documents thus delivered by Shotwell did not include special compilations made out of the regular course of business by Frank DelMonte and Busby and Oury, as demanded by the June 9, 1954 subpoenas.

4. In their brief herein, petitioners cite 26 U. S. C. A. § 7065(b).

In September and October 1955, other departmental subpoenas were served upon Homan and Byron A. Cain and Sally T. Cain, Cain Trust No. 1, and Cain & Culhane, Inc., calling for production of substantially all of their books, records and documents for the years 1947 to 1952 inclusive, relating to all of their transactions with or concerning the petitioners, or most of them.[5]

On September 15, 1955, the treasury department made a jeopardy assessment and levy against Homan for the years 1944, 1945 and 1946. The district court held the assessment and levy void. The government's appeal from that order is pending in this court.[6]

On September 16, 1955, Cain on behalf of himself, and Cain & Culhane, Inc., Homan, and Uptown Federal Savings and Loan Association of Chicago, wrote to the regional commissioner of the internal revenue service, declining to comply with the subpoenas, and stating his reasons therefor, including the statement that the materials referred to had been produced repeatedly for inspection by the government's examining agents. He averred that any further attempt to force production of such records would constitute unreasonable and unnecessary harassment and persecution, and therefore would con-

5. For example, Cain & Culhane, Inc. was directed to produce: "All accounting books and records including general ledgers, journals, cash books, auxiliary registers and ledgers, together with canceled checks, vouchers, correspondence, invoices and other written data supporting the original entries in said accounting books relating to any and all transactions had with Byron A. Cain, Sally T. Cain, John H. Cain, James B. Cain, Mary A. Cain or Patricia A. Cain either directly or indirectly, including, but not limited to all books of account relative to reimbursement by Cain & Culhane, Inc. to Byron A. Cain for expenses of any nature, including payments made to Byron A. Cain; Sally T. Cain, John H. Cain, James P. Cain, Mary A. Cain or Patricia A. Cain and payments to others for or in behalf of Byron A. Cain, Sally T. Cain, John H. Cain, James B. Cain, Mary A. Cain, or Patricia A. Cain."

stitute unreasonable searches and seizures in violation of the fourth amendment to the constitution of the United States as well as a denial of due process of law in violation of the fifth amendment to the constitution.

The treasury department has not attempted to enforce compliance with any of said subpoenas.

Prior to February 7, 1956, the treasury department recommended to the department of justice "that a grand jury investigation be undertaken to determine whether criminal proceedings should be initiated against one or more of [Cain & Culhane, Inc., Byron A. Cain and Sally T. Cain] for certain indicated violations of titles 18 and 26 U.S.C." The department of justice acceded and the attorney general appointed as special assistants Vincent P. Russo and Charles A. McNelis to conduct an investigation. Thereupon, at the behest of the treasury department and not sua sponte, the April 1956 term grand jury commenced an investigation into the income tax returns and allegedly related matters of several of the petitioners.

On April 10, 1956, Russo and McNelis caused a grand jury subpoena duces tecum to be issued directed to Leon J. Busby, an accountant who had done work for petitioners, requiring the production of documents, some of which had theretofore been by this court ordered suppressed in the criminal case. Thereupon Homan, Byron A. Cain, Harold E. Sullivan and Frank J. Huebner, by their complaint, asked the district court to quash said Busby subpoena, that Russo and McNelis be enjoined from using any of the material ordered suppressed before the grand jury, and also be enjoined from taking any witness before the grand jury for the purpose of testifying with respect to any part of said material. We affirmed an order of the district court dismissing the complaint. Homan Mfg. Co., Inc., et al. v. Russo, 233 F. 2d 547.

About July 10, 1956, Russo and McNelis caused grand jury subpoenas duces tecum to be issued directed to John H. Cain, Trustee of Cain Trust No. 1, a partnership, Byron A. Cain, Harold E. Sullivan and Gladys Morrill, "as officers of Shotwell Mfg. Co.", Byron A. Cain as President of Cain & Culhane, Inc., Byron A. Cain as President of Uptown Federal Savings & Loan Association of Chicago, and Martin A. Culhane, as a partner of Cain & Culhane, Inc., a partnership existing during the years 1944 and 1945, returnable before the said grand jury on July 20, 1956. These subpoenas called for all records of said partnership and corporations in so far as they in any way touch or concern transactions with or for Byron A. Cain or any member of his family, including Sally T. Cain, John H. Cain, James B. Cain, Mary A. Cain or Patricia A. Cain; or with Harold E. Sullivan or any member of his family, including Stella M. Sullivan, Harold E. Sullivan, Jr., and Joseph Sullivan; and Frank J. Huebner, or any member of his family, including Lowell A. Huebner, Frank J. Huebner, Jr., Lorraine Huebner Mannebach, from 1944 through 1952.

Said documents would fill between two and three vans.

The July 10, 1956 grand jury subpoenas in large part duplicate and, in important particulars, are in haec verba with the treasury's administrative subpoenas of 1954 and 1955.

About July 13, 1956, Busby complied with the April 10, 1956 subpoena by delivery of sundry documents to the grand jury, which, acting under the advice of Russo and McNelis, thereupon turned the subpoenaed documents over to treasury agents for searching, and recessed for a week.

There are pending in the United States Tax Court eight cases involving an asserted tax liability of Shotwell from 1944 through 1952, and asserted liabilities of Byron A.

Cain and Sally Cain and Cain & Culhane, Inc. for divers years, in which cases counsel for the treasury have repeatedly asserted that they are not ready for trial and require additional investigation and preparation.

Petitioners pray that "the grand jury minutes be produced in open court for examination in the premises; that the grand jury be assembled and be interrogated in the premises by the court; that the said assistant attorneys general be admonished or disciplined as to the court may seem meet; that all treasury agents who have received or in any way examined, outside the presence of a quorum of the grand jury duly assembled and in session, any of the documents surrendered under the Busby subpoena be punished for contempt".

The Department of Justice, both through the said Russo and McNelis and otherwise, has repeatedly announced that it is causing said grand jury to investigate as to whether crimes have been committed by petitioners Shotwell, Byron A. Cain, Harold E. Sullivan and Frank J. Huebner. Hence petitioners further pray that, if the court be satisfied that any of the documents surrendered to the grand jury under the said Busby subpoena have been seen or examined by any agents of the grand jury, the jury be instructed that it cannot validly consider any accusations of crime against the said named petitioners or make any inquiries as to them or return any indictments against them to which the said documents or any material in or suggested by them is or are in anyway relevant

They also pray that all of the subpoenas referred to be quashed "because the same constitute aggravated harassment of petitioners, are an unreasonable search and seizure, a violation of due process of law in violation of the several constitutional rights of the several petitioners". Petitioners further pray that the subpoenas be quashed

"because they are but a step in an illegal scheme of the treasury to subvert the grand jury subpoena of this court into a tool for a treasury fishing expedition".

During oral argument in this case, Mr. Russo stated that, in July 1956, following the entry of the order from which the appeal herein was taken, the aforesaid subpoenas duces tecum directed to John H. Cain, et al. were obeyed and the records therein called for were turned over to the grand jury which caused the same to be examined as were the other records procured by prior subpoenas. That examination still continues.

Petitioners charge misuse of the powers of the grand jury. They contend that thereby their constitutional rights under the fourth and fifth amendments of the constitution of the United States are being and will be violated. The fourth amendment provides:

> "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, * * *."

The fifth amendment provides:

> "No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; * * * nor be deprived of * * * property, without due process of law; * * *."

They claim that, as a result of said violations, they will suffer injury in two areas; first, in the return of indictments against them and, secondly, in civil proceedings for the collection of federal taxes, with interest and penalties. We shall treat of these two areas separately.

Inasmuch as this appeal pertains to an investigation of documents produced in accordance with grand jury subpoenas, the status of the grand jury in our jurisprudence is a polestar to guide us. The fifth amendment adopted the grand jury, as it existed at common law, and thereby made it a part of the fundamental law of the United States for the prosecution of crime. No part of the constitution defines the grand jury. No act of congress has ever attempted such a definition.[7] It had its origin in the common law and has existed for many hundred years.

The power of the grand jury is not dependent upon the court but is original and complete, and its duty is to diligently inquire into all offenses which shall come to its knowledge, whether from the court, the prosecutor, its own members or from any source, and it may make presentments of its own knowledge without any instruction or authority from the court. Cauley v. Warren, 216 F. 2d 74, 76.[8]

7. While Rule 6 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, 18 U.S.C.A., adopted under the authority of congress and relating to the grand jury, recognizes the continued existence of the grand jury system in this country, that rule is limited to providing a method for its organization, a manner of returning indictment or no bills, the period for which it serves, provision for relaxation of secrecy by the court, and, by enumeration, a restriction on the persons who may be present during the grand jury's sessions.

8. In Ex parte Bain, 121 U.S. 1, 30 L. Ed. 849, 852, the court quoted with approval the language of Justice Field in a charge to a grand jury:

> "The institution of the grand jury is of very ancient origin in the history of England—it goes back many centuries. For a long period its powers were not clearly defined; and it would seem from the accounts of commentators on the laws of that country that it was at first a body which not only accused, but which also tried, public offenders. However this may have been in its origin, it was at the time of the settlement of this country an informing and accusing tribunal only, without whose previous action no person charged with a felony could, except in certain special cases, be put upon his trial. * * * the institution was adopted in this country, and is continued from considerations similar to those which give

In Costello v. United States, 350 U. S. 359, at 361, the court said:

> "The Fifth Amendment provides that federal prosecutions for capital or otherwise infamous crimes must be instituted by presentments or indictments of grand juries. But neither the Fifth Amendment nor any other constitutional provision prescribes the kind of evidence upon which grand juries must act. The grand jury is an English institution, brought to this country by the early colonists and incorporated in the Constitution by the Founders. There is every reason to believe that our constitutional grand jury was intended to operate substantially like its English progenitor. The basic purpose of the English grand jury was to provide a fair method for instituting criminal proceedings against persons believed to have committed crimes. Grand jurors were selected from the body of the people and their work was not hampered by rigid procedural or evidential rules. In fact, grand jurors could act on their own knowledge and were free to make their presentments or indictments on such information as they deemed satisfactory. Despite its broad power to institute criminal proceedings the grand jury grew in popular favor with the years. It acquired an independence in England free from control by the Crown or judges. Its adoption in our Constitution as the sole method for preferring charges in serious criminal cases shows the high place it held as an instrument of justice. And in this country as to it its chief value in England, and is designed as a means, not only of bringing to trial persons accused of public offenses upon just grounds, but also as a means of protecting the citizens against unfounded accusation, whether it come from the government, or be prompted by partisan passion or private enmity. No person shall be required, according to the fundamental law of the country, except in the cases mentioned, to answer for any of the higher crimes unless this body, consisting of not less than sixteen nor more than twenty-three good and lawful men, selected from the body of the district, shall declare upon careful deliberation, under the solemnity of an oath, that there is good reason for his accusation and trial." > in England of old the grand jury has convened as a body of laymen, free from technical rules, acting in secret, pledged to indict no one because of prejudice and to free no one because of special favor".

While the grand jury is, in a sense, a part of our court system, when exercising its traditional functions it possesses an independence which is unique. Its authority is derived from none of the three basic divisions of our government, but rather directly from the people themselves. It is unnecessary for us to enunciate general rules as to when a grand jury may so exceed its historic authority as to justify a court in interfering with its investigatorial power. In the case at bar, we are asked to decide only whether the 1956 April term grand jury was acting within its authority in swearing witnesses and then entrusting them with subpoenaed records and documents for the purpose of examination thereof by or under the direction of said witnesses, out of the physical presence of the jury or any member thereof, for the purpose of assisting the grand jury in its deliberations.

While it is true that, at least in a limited sense, the testimony before a grand jury of witnesses who, pursuant to its direction, have examined voluminous records and documents and testify as to what they have found therein, is hearsay evidence, that fact would not make it improper for the grand jury to consider it.[9]

9. In Costello v. United States, supra, at 362, the court said:

> "* * * As late as 1927 an English historian could say that English grand juries were still free to act on their own knowledge if they pleased to do so. And in 1852 Mr. Justice Nelson on circuit could say 'No case has been cited, nor have we been able to find any, furnishing an authority for looking into and revising the judgment of the grand jury upon the evidence, for the purpose of determining whether or not the finding was founded upon sufficient proof . . .' United States v. Reed, 27 Fed. Cas. 727, 738.

> "* * * If indictments were to be held open to challenge on the ground that there was inadequate or incompetent evi-

1. In view of the independence of the grand jury and its traditional functions, on the showing made it would be incongruous for the district court to require the grand jury to produce its minutes in open court for examination, to assemble and interrogate it or the members thereof, to admonish or discipline the assistant attorneys general assigned to the grand jury, to instruct the jury that it cannot validly consider any accusations of crime against petitioners, make any inquiries as to them, return any indictments against them, to which the documents in question are relevant, or that the court should quash the grand jury subpoenas because, it is claimed, they are but a step in an illegal scheme to subvert the grand jury subpoena into a tool for a treasury fishing expedition. On the facts appearing in the petition alone, it would be unwarranted for the court to punish for contempt treasury agents merely because they have received or examined, dence before the grand jury, the resulting delay would be great indeed. The result of such a rule would be that before trial on the merits a defendant could always insist on a kind of preliminary trial to determine the competency and adequacy of the evidence before the grand jury. This is not required by the Fifth Amendment. An indictment returned by a legally constituted and unbiased grand jury like an information drawn by the prosecutor, if valid on its face, is enough to call for trial of the charge on the merits. The Fifth Amendment requires nothing more. . . .

"Petitioner urges that this court should exercise its power to supervise the administration of justice in federal courts and establish a rule permitting defendants to challenge indictments on the ground that they are not supported by adequate or competent evidence. No persuasive reasons are advanced for establishing such a rule. It would run counter to the whole history of the grand jury institution, in which laymen conduct their inquiries unfettered by technical rules. Neither justice nor the concept of a fair trial requires such a change. In a trial on the merits, defendants are entitled to a strict observance of all the rules designed to bring about a fair verdict. Defendants are not entitled, however, to a rule which would result in an interminable delay but add nothing to the assurance of a fair trial."

outside the presence of a quorum of the grand jury assembled and in session, any of the documents surrendered to the grand jury in response to its subpoenas, and it would also be unwarranted for the court to quash all of the subpoenas on the ground of the constitutional violations charged. Any such actions by the district court would be gratuitous.

What we have just said should not be construed as precluding the right of the district court, to which indictments against the petitioners may be returned, from considering, if and when properly raised there, the contentions of the petitioners that their constitutional rights, herein relied on, were violated in the processes culminating in said indictments. Of course, we express no opinion as to how the district court should then rule. While we hold that the grand jury's actions under the circumstances are immune from interference by the court, we feel that any indictments which it votes, when they reach the court, carry no immunity from the application of the court's established criminal procedure.

2. In this country, as in England of old, the grand jury acts in secret. Costello v. United States, supra, at 362. Grand jury proceedings are traditionally secret. United States v. Rose, 215 F. 2d 617, 628. From earliest times it has been the policy of the law to shield the proceedings of grand juries from public scrutiny. Courts and text writers have advanced various reasons for this rule of secrecy. For a comprehensive review of this matter see Goodman v. United States, 108 F. 2d 516, 519, 127 A. L. R. 265 and the annotation at 272. See also, Reichert v. Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 214 F. 2d 19, 22.[10]

10. In the Reichert case, in speaking of a state statute dealing with grand juries, we quoted the reasons for secrecy as stated in Schmidt v. U.S., 115 F. 2d 394, at 396, by way of quotation from U.S. v. Amazon Industrial Corp., 55 F. 2d 254, 261:

"'(1) To prevent the escape of those whose indictment

The uncontradicted facts in this case in themselves point to an additional reason. The government had by various administrative subpoenas endeavored to gain access to the documents and records referred to in the petition. Having failed in that effort, government counsel made no effort to compel compliance with said subpoenas. Evidently they abandoned all civil procedures available to them. Instead they resorted to grand jury subpoenas and thereby brought those documents and records before the grand jury. With the consent of the grand jury this material has been turned over to treasury agents, who, with their assistants, have been examining it. If these efforts are directed toward the procuring of evidence for civil proceedings now or hereafter pending against petitioners, and that purpose is accomplished, then the secrecy of the grand jury has been breached. We find nothing in the history of the grand jury to justify the perversion of its functions or machinery by third persons for the purposes of a civil proceeding. The fifth amendment's adoption of the grand jury for use in the United States was for the historic purpose of initiating prosecutions for serious crimes. With the grand jury came its time-honored policy of secrecy. The idea that information obtained from the may be contemplated; (2) to insure the utmost freedom to the grand jury in its deliberations, and to prevent persons subject to indictment or friends from importuning the grand jurors; (3) to prevent subornation of perjury or tampering with the witnesses who may testify before the grand jury and later appear at the trial of those indicted by it; (4) to encourage free and untrammeled disclosures by persons who have information with respect to the commission of crimes; (5) to protect the innocent accused who is exonerated from disclosure of the fact that he has been under investigation, and from the expense of standing trial where there was no probability of guilt. It is obvious that the basis of all but the last of these reasons for secrecy is protection of the grand jury itself, as the direct independent representative of the public as a whole, rather than of those brought before the grand jury."

perusal of material in the possession of a grand jury may be used for the purpose of a civil proceeding is in direct conflict with the policy of secrecy of grand jury proceedings.

Moreover, the public has an interest in maintaining the secrecy of the grand jury. This is because the grand jury is the direct, independent representative of the people as a whole rather than those brought before it. The application of secrecy to its proceedings is a safeguard for the grand jury itself, because it tends to prevent it from being used as an instrument for explorations in aid of civil proceedings. Otherwise such misuse of the grand jury's time and functions might in a substantial degree interfere with its investigation of crime and the return of indictments and no bills.

We are aware that it has been held that, if, after an indictment has been found and made public and the defendant has been apprehended, Metzler v. United States, 64 F. 2d 203, 206, and the grand jury discharged, Atwell v. United States, 162 Fed. 97, 101, a disclosure becomes essential to the attainment of justice and the vindication of the truth, the rule of secrecy may be relaxed in the discretion of the court. This responsibility should reside in the court, of which the grand jury is a part and under the general instructions of which, it conducts its "judicial inquiry". Schmidt v. United States, 115 F. 2d 394, 397. But, in the cases just cited, the purposes for relaxation of secrecy were fundamentally different from the government's purpose in searching for evidence, in the case before us. Therefore, in the situation presented to us in the case at bar, we hold that the safeguard of secrecy, in the interest of the public, continues even after the grand jury has completed its efforts and therefore forbids any use in civil proceedings of information derived by or through an examination of records and documents made under the authority of the grand jury.

It is significant that the government's counsel, in their brief herein, first, do not challenge the proposition that a grand jury subpoena cannot be used for the purpose of obtaining evidence to be used in a civil proceeding; and secondly, do not disclaim an intention to use, in civil proceedings, information gleaned from examination of the records and documents subpoenaed by the grand jury in this case.

We said in Homan Mfg. Co., et al. v. Russo, et al., 233 F. 2d 547, that the proceedings of the grand jury are secret but that we had no right to presume that the grand jury would permit records covered by its subpoenas to be diverted to the use of third persons, or that defendants propose or intend such diversion. We added that such a proposed use, if attempted, would invoke the protective power of the district court, which could act either contemporaneously or afterward in connection with such attempt. The admitted facts now before us show that there is a need for the exercise of the protective power of the district court.

3. While we hold that the district court cannot properly interfere with the action of the grand jury in turning over to third persons, including treasury agents, voluminous records and accounts for the sole purpose of examination and report to the grand jury, as an assistance to it, we also hold that persons, nonmembers of the grand jury, thus having access to said records and documents, have no right to use them for any purpose whatsoever except to assist the grand jury in its work. Such persons may not in any manner use these records and documents, or any information acquired therefrom, for any other purpose, and specifically for any civil purpose, such as tax collection or otherwise. The right to freedom from interference by the court, which the grand jury enjoys, does not extend to such treasury agents or other third persons, including those who work with, under, or superior to said treasury agents. The direct or indirect use of any of the records and documents in question, or any information gained therefrom, in any civil proceeding can be prevented if objection is timely made therein. Moreover, the protective power of the district court should now be used to restrain any of such persons from in any manner violating the secrecy which enveloped these records and documents when the grand jury turned them over for examination. Such a restraining order should, of course, be in such detail and directed to such persons as to make it capable of effective enforcement. Thus, these are some of the ways in which the courts can and should implement the constitutional guarantees upon which the petitioners here rely. While, in a criminal prosecution based upon indictments of these petitioners (if they are indicted) they will be required to await the return of said indictments before having a hearing in the trial court on their contentions that their constitutional rights were violated, we think it is now apparent that, as far as civil proceedings are concerned, the production of these records and documents pursuant to a grand jury subpoena, if followed by their use in any manner for the purposes of such a civil proceeding against petitioners, violates their constitutional rights under the hereinbefore quoted provisions of the fourth and fifth amendments.

For the reasons herein set forth, the order from which this appeal was taken, is reversed and this cause is remanded to the district court for further proceedings not inconsistent with the views herein expressed.

APPENDIX III.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
For the Northern District of Illinois,
Eastern Division.

HOMAN MFG. CO., INC., a corporation,	Plaintiff,	Civil Action No. 55 C 1541
vs.
D. J. LUIPPOLD, et al.,	Defendants.

FINDINGS OF FACT.

The Court finds the following as facts established by the evidentiary material presented to it on the motions for summary judgment herein and that there is no genuine issue as to the same:

1. The Court has jurisdiction of the parties and the subject matter.

2. Homan Mfg. Co., Inc., plaintiff herein, was formerly known as "The Shotwell Manufacturing Co." It is one of the defendants in a certain criminal income tax case, entitled United States of America v. The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, et al., cause No. 52 CR 143 on the dockets of this Court, hereafter in these findings and conclusions sometimes referred to as "the criminal case."

3. The criminal case was commenced by the filing of an indictment on March 14, 1952, alleging that the net income of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company was understated in its tax returns for the calendar years 1945 and 1946 in the sum of $490,719.52, resulting in a tax deficiency of $286,607.79. Upon the trial of the criminal case, Charles J. Mammel, Revenue Agent, testified that upon the basis of all the evidence in that case the understatement of income for the years 1945 and 1946 was $453,872.40.

4. On February 7, 1949 Charles J. Mammel was assigned as Revenue Agent to investigate Federal income tax returns of the plaintiff for the years 1944, 1945 and 1946, and has worked on an investigation of the plaintiff's tax returns for the said three years, and possibly others, to the exclusion of everything else from that time to this. At various times he has had as many as nine other Revenue Agents or employees of the Internal Revenue Service working under him and assisting him in his work.

5. On, and for some time prior to, September 15, 1955, all of the assets of the plaintiff (except a small amount of office furniture and records and an automobile) consisted of cash in checking accounts in Chicago banks or in deposits or shares in sundry Federal Savings and Loan associations, and amounted to approximately $1,114,000. Said assets had been held in such form for some considerable time and plaintiff did not intend to secrete or hide them.

6. On September 15, 1955, the Internal Revenue Service issued and served a jeopardy levy against the plaintiff and against all of the financial institutions in which its funds were lodged asserting that the total sum of $3,172,123.65 was then due and owing the United States from the plaintiff for additional income and excess profits taxes, penalties and interest for the years 1944, 1945 and 1946, beyond those reported and paid by plaintiff. The said levy asserted that of the foregoing sum $755,190.98 was due for taxes for the year 1945, exclusive of penalties and interest, and $281,029.72 was due for taxes for the year 1946, exclusive of penalties and interest. The total amount of taxes and penalties asserted by the said assessment was $2,306,900.05. On or about November 14, 1955, the Internal Revenue Service issued a notice of determination of income tax liability for the said three years in which it asserted deficiencies of $2,122,944.94 for alleged taxes and penalties. The difference (excluding interest) between the amount of the jeopardy assessment of September 15, 1955 and the determination of November 14, 1955 came from a recomputation of tax rates and correction of mathematical errors and not from any substantial change in asserted income forming the base for the tax.

7. The said assessment and determination were based on the work and conclusions of Charles J. Mammel, and with insubstantial deviations represent his determinations of taxable income, notwithstanding the assessment itself is signed in the name of another person.

8. The assessment in question is patently arbitrary, capricious and wholly void.

9. In making his determinations of taxable net income Mammel made no attempt to be fair to the taxpayer at any time; he proceeded on the assumption that he was only required to be fair to the taxpayer "if I can" and did not adhere even to that standard.

10. The alleged additional income determined by Mammel consists principally of (a) alleged over-ceiling cash "premiums," paid by one Lubben which asserted payments were the subject matter of the criminal case; (b) approximately $964,000 gross income which it is asserted should have resulted from extra manufacture of candy which Mammel believes should have occurred but which is not reflected on the records of the company; and (c) disallowance of sundry items of expense. In determining item (a) above Mammel both relied upon, and misconstrued, items of evidence ordered suppressed in the criminal case, relied upon altered and changed purported records of said Lubben, wholly failed to make any good faith practical judgment as to offsetting black-market expenditures, and acted essentially upon an informal determination he had made in late 1951 or early 1952 and ignored relevant facts brought to his attention between that time and September 1955 showing that at least part of his initial determination were erroneous. In determining item (b) above Mammel was wholly imaginary and did not even purport to find whether the so-called extra production remained in inventory or was sold and admits that he has no evidence that so much as one pound of this asserted extra 4,000,000 pounds of candy was ever sold or shipped or remained in possession. In determining substantial disallowances comprising item (c) above Mammel failed to follow reasonable procedures to test the verity of plaintiff's claimed deductions but made disallowances by whim and caprice on the excuse that he "didn't have time" between 1949 and 1955 to investigate. The arbitrary, capricious and unlawful actions in this finding described were carried into and are substantially found in the determination of November 14, 1955.

11. Mammel's determinations were arbitrary, capricious and unlawful in the extreme and it is not necessary to decide whether such actions sprang from malice, incapacity, or a desire to justify the length of time and large amounts of manpower consumed in this investigation, or from a combination of these or other reasons.

Mammel suffered a complete mental breakdown on March 19, 1953 and upon cross-examination in February 1956 was unable to recall basic rules of taxation involved in this case and which should have come into play when he made the assessment of September 1955. He also was unable to recall important points developed during the criminal trial of late 1953 to which he should have applied fair judgment in making the 1955 assessment.

12. The making of the assessment and jeopardy levy has had the effect of completely tying up, with de minimis exceptions, all of the taxpayer's assets. Unless the arbitrary assessment and levy is set aside the taxpayer will be without funds to pay the fees and taxes necessary to maintain its corporate existence. If collection upon the jeopardy levy was permitted, all of the taxpayer's assets would be seized and it would be without funds to engage lawyers, accountants or pay any other expenses necessarily incident to a legal proceeding to recover the unlawful exaction resulting from Mammel's arbitrary and capricious assessment.

13. Special and extraordinary circumstances exist in this case so as to make inapplicable section 7421 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 relating to injunctions against the assessment and collection of taxes.

14. The United States has actively participated in and controlled the defense of this litigation.

15. No genuine issue as to any material fact exists in this case.

CONCLUSIONS OF LAW.

1. The jeopardy assessment of September 15, 1955, made against the taxpayer, and all subsequent proceedings based thereon were made unlawfully and in violation of the taxpayer's constitutional rights and hence are wholly null and void.

2. The jeopardy assessment being wholly void and of no legal effect created no lien in favor of the United States and the United States is not a necessary party to this action.

3. Plaintiff is entitled to a permanent injunction against the enforcement of the assessment and levy of September 15, 1955, and any other proceedings or rights that might be claimed by virtue of said assessment and levy or any new assessment based on the present determinations of Charles J. Mammel.

4. Section 7421 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 does not prevent the Court from entering an injunction under the circumstances of this case.

5. Defendant's motion for a summary judgment should be denied.

6. Plaintiff's motion for a summary judgment should be granted.

MOTION TO WITHDRAW FROM OPPOSITION TO GOVERNMENT'S PETITION FOR CERTIORARI, MOTION TO WITHDRAW FROM CONDITIONAL CROSS-PETITION FOR CERTIORARI, AND CONSENT TO GOVERNMENT'S MOTION TO REMAND (AMENDED)

I am one of the respondents and cross-petitioners in the proceedings pending before this Court. As a defendant in the trial court, I was convicted and sentenced, my conviction having been reversed upon appeal. I joined in the opposition to the Government's petition for a writ of certiorari and also in the conditional cross-petition for a writ of certiorari.

I subsequently testified before the April 1956 Term Grand Jury for the Northern District of Illinois to the extent of my knowledge on the facts concerning the voluntary disclosure alleged to have been made for and on behalf of The Shotwell Manufacturing Company. I have also provided to the Government an affidavit which I understand is to be filed by the Government in support of its motion to remand.

I now desire, and respectfully request the permission of this Court, to withdraw from the opposition to the Government's petition for certiorari, and to withdraw from the conditional cross-petition for certiorari, and to consent to the Government's motion that the case be remanded to the District Court for the Northern District of Illinois.

Respectfully submitted,

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

MOTION FOR LEAVE TO WITHDRAW AS COUNSEL FOR FRANK J. HUEBNER.

Now come Harold A. Smith, George B. Christensen, Howard Ellis and William T. Kirby, and move that they be permitted to withdraw as attorneys of record for Frank J. Huebner, who has filed a motion herein In Propria Persona consenting to the Government's position in all matters now pending before the Court. In support of their motion, movants attach the affidavits of Neal J. McAuliffe and George B. Christensen and the consent of said Huebner to their withdrawal, and respectfully show:

On December 14, 1956, movants learned for the first time that in August or September, 1956, Huebner, under circumstances not known to movants, testified before the April 1956 Term Grand Jury, which, inter alia, has been investigating this case. Events subsequent to December 14, 1956, have demonstrated to movants that Huebner for some months has not relied upon them as his attorneys, and he appears to be fully within the control of Government counsel.

Movants show by the annexed affidavits that Huebner for some time has been seriously upset because of the strain of this protracted prosecution.

Movants make the following points with respect to the motion of Huebner and to illustrate the propriety of relieving movants of responsibility as counsel for him:

1. Huebner is basically mistaken in consenting that this Court grant certiorari for the reason that a question as to a detail of the former "voluntary disclosure" policy no longer is (if it ever was) a question of public importance and for the other reasons set out in movants' opposition to certiorari.

2. Huebner is basically mistaken in consenting that the case should be remanded to the District Court for a supplemental suppression of evidence hearing as to "timeliness" of the disclosure because Government counsel admit the disclosure in any event was made in July 1948. The Treasury had not "initiated investigation" (as that phrase is defined by the controlling "Wenchel objective test") by that date; in fact, never did initiate an investigation independently of that flowing from disclosure. That a disclosure was made is uncontested, and, whether in January or July 1948 (or some intermediate date), it was timely under Treasury rules. These salient facts, movants believe, cannot be avoided by any affidavit which Huebner may have given.

3. Huebner is basically mistaken in consenting to the motion to remand because that motion does not show the existence of such new evidence and such diligence as are necessary to support a motion for a partial new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence.

4. Huebner is basically mistaken if he is under the impression that by consenting to the Government's motion he may (should the convictions ever be affirmed) escape the sentence originally imposed by the District Court because the mandate of the Court of Appeals has not been stayed; under Criminal Rule 35, the District Court long since lost jurisdiction to change the sentence (Cf. U. S. v. Hunter, 162 F. 2d 644).

5. Huebner is without legal training and is unequipped to decide, or to advise the Court, whether the Government ever may move for a new trial in a criminal case on the ground of alleged new evidence. Yet it would appear that he committed himself to his present course of action without legal advice.

Movants cannot prevent Huebner from making legal mistakes which they believe are detrimental to him and are not helpful to the Court; they should be permitted to withdraw.

Respectfully submitted,

NEAL J. MCAULIFFE, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that movants heretofore have entered their appearance as counsel for all respondents and cross-petitioners in the foregoing entitled case; that affiant is a partner of Harold A. Smith and George B. Christensen, two of counsel of record for respondents and cross-petitioners herein, is familiar with the proceedings herein, and has worked as a lawyer on this case during all steps in the appellate proceedings.

That on December 12, 1956, Frank J. Huebner, who has filed a motion to withdraw from opposition to the Government's petition for certiorari, etc., in a telephone conversation with him, informed affiant that he "had his own lawyer," who was Frank J. Smith, 10 South La Salle Street, Chicago, Illinois; that he, the said Huebner, was "sick of the whole case"; that it would probably drag on for many more years, and that he wanted to get it over with one way or the other; that Huebner would not make answer to pertinent questions relating to the defense of the case but repeatedly told affiant that he would not discuss the matter further with affiant or his partners; that this was the first notice that affiant or any of the attorneys of record had that Huebner was not relying on them.

That on December 14, 1956, affiant had a conversation with said Attorney Frank J. Smith, who told affiant that he, the said Smith, was not well informed as to the case but that Huebner had told him that he had testified before the Grand Jury in August or September, 1956, and before seeking legal advice from him; that affiant suggested to Smith that Huebner apparently had acted without any independent legal advice whatsoever, and that affiant did not believe that Huebner knew what his rights or duties were, that the pressure of years of litigation and perhaps continuous pressure and threats or promises by Treasury Agents, unbeknown to affiant and his partners, had reduced Huebner to a state where he was so mentally upset that he should be allowed to take no action whatsoever without advice of competent independent counsel; that Attorney Smith told affiant that in view of the fact that Huebner had dealt with representatives of the Treasury unbeknown to affiant or his partners, or before retaining him, and from the tenor of Huebner's recent communications with him, he was convinced that Huebner had made up his mind not to oppose the Government and that he believed there was nothing he could do about it; Smith said he expected to see Huebner Saturday afternoon, December 15th, and learn more about the case and Huebner's attitude.

GEORGE B. CHRISTENSEN, being first duly sworn, on oath deposes and says that he is one of the attorneys of record herein; that on December 17, 1956, he had a conversation with Attorney Frank J. Smith, who is identified in the affidavit of Neal J. McAuliffe submitted herewith, in which affiant pointed out that the time within which the defendants were permitted to answer the Government's motion to remand would expire on December 22, 1956; that it was affiant's opinion that Frank J. Huebner should resist the motion to remand because even though he had testified before the Grand Jury, affiant and other counsel who had studied the case were of the opinion that he could have given no testimony that would invalidate the voluntary disclosure herein for the record indisputably showed that no investigation of Shotwell's tax returns, independent or separate from that flowing from the disclosure, ever had been made; that Huebner himself was not competent to decide, or to know, what constituted either a sufficient or a timely voluntary disclosure; that in the opinion of affiant Huebner was so distraught from years of litigation that he was not competent to protect his own interests in a complex legal matter and could become an easy victim of overzealous or misinformed Government agents.

Attorney Smith replied in substance that he had not had time to familiarize himself with the entire situation; that he did not know what Huebner's ultimate attitude would be but that at that time he would not consent that his name be recorded in opposition to the Government's motion.

Affiant told Smith that it was apparent that Huebner was no longer following, and no longer wanted, the advice of present counsel of record; that although it was the opinion of affiant that Huebner needed advice from counsel fully familiar with the record, under the circumstances present counsel of record should be relieved of any duty to protect him.

On December 26, 1956, present counsel of record requested in writing that Huebner consent to their withdrawal, and on December 31, 1956, they were furnished the written consent to withdrawal dated December 27, 1956, submitted with this affidavit.

REPLY TO SUPPLEMENT TO MOTION TO REMAND

The "Supplement" to the Motion to Remand should be recognized and condemned for what it is—a disgraceful, police court attempt to avoid or obscure, by a barrage of accusations against our clients, the unanswerable propositions, adherence to which is essential in a proper system of criminal justice, that are set forth in our "Answer to Motion (Amended) to Remand."

THE SIGNIFICANT FACTUAL ASPECT OF THE "SUPPLEMENT" IS THAT IT ESTABLISHES THAT IN ANY EVENT THERE WAS A DISCLOSURE BY JULY 1948 WHICH WOULD HAVE BEEN TIMELY.

THE SIGNIFICANT LEGAL ASPECT OF THE "SUPPLEMENT" IS THAT IT CONCEDES THE CORRECTNESS OF OUR MAJOR PROPOSITION THAT IN NO EVENT CAN THE GOVERNMENT MOVE FOR A PARTIAL NEW TRIAL IN A CRIMINAL CASE IN AN ATTEMPT TO VALIDATE A CONVICTION ALREADY OBTAINED. It does this in the last half of its page 5 and on page 6 where the prosecutors deny that they are in any sense moving for a partial new trial as we have asserted. After conceding by indirection that they could not so do, they go on, in different words, to ask for precisely that but under a different label. They say they are asking that the district court make "a full investigation and determination of the matters involved," and "receive and appraise testimony and evidence bearing on the controverted questions of fact."

To "receive and appraise" "evidence" and to make a "determination" is so obviously to hold a trial, or, in the circumstances here, a partial, additional or supplemental trial in an effort to validate the original convictions, that it is effrontery to pretend otherwise.[1]

1. Carpenter v. Winn, 122 U. S. 533, 538:

"Blackstone defines 'trial' to be the examination of the matters of fact in issue * * * But the word often has a broader significance, as referring to that final examination and decision of matter of law as well as fact for which every antecedent step is a preparation, which we commonly denominate 'the trial.'"

Black's Law Dictionary, 4th Edition:

"A judicial examination, in accordance with law of the land, of a cause, either civil or criminal, of the issues between the parties, whether of law or fact, before a court that has jurisdiction over it."

88 C. J. S., p. 19:

"As used in its legal sense with respect to judicial proceedings 'trial' is a familiar common-law term denoting a judicial examination of the issues in an action."

Aktiebolaget Svenska Handelsbanken v. Chase National Bank, 69 F. Supp. 833, 834:

By the vehemence and speciousness of their protest that they are not seeking a new trial, the prosecutors effectively concede that our system of law does not permit them so to do; their complex language as to "evidence," "controverted questions," "appraisals" and a "determination," cannot conceal, but quite clearly proves, that nevertheless that is exactly what they seek.

The force of this must not be overlooked—in our Answer (pp. 13-16) we argued that the prosecutors were seeking a wholly impermissible end—that the recorded judicial history of the country fails to show any such prior attempt. That argument alone is fatal to the Motion to Remand, regardless of by what affidavits it be supported. It would have been answered squarely if there were answer that could be made. Unable to answer it, or to cite authority, the prosecutors have resorted to the frivolous assertion that they want a new "determination" rather than a "new trial." One must look to Lewis Carroll rather than to law books to find the counterpart of such reasoning.

The Court is here dealing with the liberty of citizens of heretofore unblemished reputation (R. 2686-2705); it is dealing with fundamental rules of criminal procedure that have been recognized as necessary, wise and just throughout this Court's existence; it is dealing also with an attempt to have it rule that hereafter criminal cases

"In a restricted sense a trial denotes that step in an action by which issues of fact are decided. In a broader sense, a trial is a judicial examination of the issues between the parties, whether they be issues of law or of fact."

People v. Richetti, 302 N. Y. 290, 97 N. E. 2d 908, 911;

"For centuries a 'trial' of a dispute of fact has meant 'the examination, before a competent tribunal, according to the laws of the land, of the facts put in issue, for the purpose of determining such issue.'"

In People v. Looney, 314 Ill. 150, 145 N. E. 365, 367, the Court held that the word "trial" includes all preliminary and subsequent proceedings after the return of the indictment.

may be tried piece-meal with the prosecutor traveling back and forth between appellate and trial courts until finally he either wears out the defendant or puts in, one way or another, enough evidence to satisfy the appellate tribunal. We cannot believe the Court ever will countenance so vicious a proposition.

If we are correct in what we have said thus far it follows that the Motion to Remand must be denied and it will be unnecessary for the Court to consider the balance of this Reply. Additionally, as we shall show, the Huebner testimony, which is alleged reason for the Supplement, was in the Government's possession considerably before the Motion to Remand was filed. Such of it as was believed material was reflected in the attorneys' hearsay affidavits attached thereto. All that the Huebner affidavit itself adds is disparaging material that conceivably might be relevant to some other indictment, or to the merits of this case, but is not material to the disclosure issues here—it does not in any way invalidate our previous Answer to the Motion.

However, the Supplement is so unusual a document and so trespasses on the rights of our clients, that we make further reply to it:

Assuming That the Government May Move for a New Trial on the Ground of Newly Discovered Evidence, the Supplement Is Insufficient.

The reason advanced for a further trial is that the prosecutors wish now to prove, through assertedly newly discovered evidence, that the disclosure was an "untimely" one—this is the ultimate factual and legal "determination" aimed at. But if everything in the Huebner affidavit be taken as true, it proves that a disclosure was made at least by July 1948. If it be considered as proving (which we shall show it does not), that a disclosure was not made in January-March 1948, it nevertheless would show, for the legal reasons set forth in our Answer to the Motion to Remand (pp. 5-7, 19-24), to which counsel attempt no reply, a disclosure which, under definitive Treasury pronouncements and offers for disclosures, would have been timely. At the most, therefore, it is merely impeaching as to an immaterial point. Impeachment even as to a material point always has been ruled an insufficient ground for a new trial. (See U. S. v. Johnson, 142 F. 2d 588, 592, quoted at p. 17 Answer to Motion to Remand.)

But does the Supplement show contradiction of evidence as to when the disclosure was made? Despite its strident, generalized claims of "perjury" (quite in contrast with the modest claim of a "conceivably altered result" advanced in the Motion to Remand), does it make even a prima facie showing of perjury, or contradiction on a material point on the suppression hearing?

The Supplement asserts (p. 4) only that Huebner will testify on three points:

(1) That Lubben made over-ceiling payments from November 1944 to December 1946, rather than from September 1945 to June 1946 as defendants asserted. This goes solely to the merits of the case. This question was in no way involved in the suppression hearing. It has no bearing on the timeliness of the disclosure and therefore may be disregarded.

(2) That during the first six months of 1948 no one "mentioned" to Huebner (p. 8) that a disclosure had been made; that in July 1948 he was at the meeting with Shotwell staff people in the Belden-Stratford Hotel at which the recapitulations were prepared "so that a disclosure could be made;" that prior to this "so far as he knows" no work was done by anyone relative to compiling data "for the purpose of making a voluntary disclosure;" that he was "given to understand" the date would be set at June 15, 1948. It is said (p. 4) that this contradicts suppression testimony by auditor Busby that Huebner was at a meeting in late January at which it was decided to make a disclosure, and by Cain that Huebner "possibly" was there.[2] And it does. But it does not contradict the testimony of Busby, Cain and Sauber that the disclosure in fact was made in the January-March period, that Sauber told them to assemble figures to assist the agents who would make an audit or investigation (R. 178, 182, 215, 232), that this work "dragged" and that finally Cain assembled the staff and got the job done (R. 232-3).

Neither Busby nor Cain in lengthy testimony as to the events leading up to the disclosure and as to the work done in assembling figures thereafter, mentioned Huebner as playing any part until the staff met to assist in putting together the final recapitulations, except that Busby gave a single answer (R. 176) that Huebner was present when Cain made the decision to disclose, while Cain at one point said Huebner "possibly" was (R. 228-9) and at another excluded him (R. 249). Out of many meetings between these people on many subjects in this period involving not merely taxes but a loan Lubben was requesting, any one of the three could be mistaken. Busby's and Cain's testimony as to who was present at this particular meeting was as to an immaterial point. The fact that Huebner's present alleged recollection differs from theirs is not unusual, is still a difference as to an immaterial point, and certainly does not show perjury by Busby or Cain or, for that matter, by Huebner. And Huebner's affidavit that "no one mentioned to him" that a disclosure had been made plainly does not contradict evidence that one had been made. In neither law nor fact does the president of a corporation (Cain) always tell a plant manager (Huebner) everything he has done.

2. It may be noted that at one point Cain said Huebner was "possibly" there (R. 228-9), at another he identified only himself and Sullivan as being at this particular session with Busby (R 249). This is indicative of the fact that the witnesses were endeavoring, within the limits of memory, to give honest testimony —it is indicative also of the unimportance or immateriality of this particular meeting to the issues that were being tried.

The affidavit discloses that someone has drilled into Huebner the notion that a disclosure could be made only by presenting a document containing corrected figures. Thus he says that the recapitulations were made "so that" a disclosure could be made. The fact that the disclosure per se consisted merely of coming forth and identifying one's self as having filed an improper return, that the Treasury always reserved the right to make its own investigation in verification of the disclosure, and that assistance by the tax payer in making a correct return was at most in the nature of a condition subsequent to the disclosure (Cf. Answer to Motion to Remand, pp. 28-29; see also footnote 2 thereof, p. 3), is one that has escaped Mr. Huebner and the prosecutors from whom he apparently is taking his advice. ("The simple statement that 'I have filed false tax returns and I want to make the Government whole,' would constitute a complete disclosure." Treasury release, May 14, 1947, R. 3136.)

(3) That sometime in the late summer or early fall of 1948 Cain and Busby told Huebner the case had been "fixed" for a tax deficiency of $20,000, but that someone destroyed the settlement papers. While this carries overtones of wrongdoing, it has nothing to do with the disclosure question because admittedly Agent Lima was assigned on July 30, 1948 (Dft. Ex. 15 at R. 3173, R. 321) to investigate or audit the company pursuant to the disclosure and had gone to work on the case.

Of the three items of proof, then, on which the Supplement claims the case should be reopened, items (1) and (3) obviously have no relevancy to the disclosure timeliness issue that is pressed as the reason for reopening. Item (2), while connected with the disclosure events, is not material to the issue and could not support a motion for a new trial. New evidence that might warrant a new trial (assuming the Government could move for one), would have to be in direct contradiction of something originally given at the suppression hearing that was vital to a decision of the issue. Analysis demonstrates that the Supplement, despite its poisonous air, offers nothing that would warrant a new trial even if one were permissible.

By Failure to Support the Legal and Factual Theories of the Motion to Remand, i. e., That on June 21, 1948, Treasury Agents Got a "Scent", Which Would Make Any Disclosure Thereafter Untimely, the Supplement Is an Effective Demonstration That Those Theories Are Wrong.

The fact that the Supplement is a reply to our "Answer" to the Motion to Remand, cannot be disguised. It argues vigorously, albeit erroneously, against our argument that the Government cannot move for a partial new trial in order to validate a conviction already obtained; footnote 2 of the Supplement is a direct, although merely assertive, reply to our contention, supported by cases, (Answer, p. 10) that the result of the administrative proceedings against Sauber was exoneration from charges of official wrongdoing in connection with this case.

Since the Supplement is a reply to our Answer, it is of utmost significance that not a word is said to dispute the detailed demonstrations, based on the record and Treasury documents, at pages 4 to 7 and 19 to 25 of the Answer showing that the Intelligence Agents did not get a clue or "scent" as to tax violations by Shotwell on June 21, 1948, and that even if they had, a disclosure thereafter would have been timely. Huebner, for all the extraneous matter in his affidavit, only fortifies the fact that a disclosure was made and that the disclosure brought about the investigation conducted by agent Lima.

Moreover, the report of Intelligence Agent Krane (R. 3166-3170), made in 1950 when events were fresh in people's minds and unconfused by the varying theories of successive sets of Government lawyers, shows conclusively that no independent investigation of Shotwell was even considered until long after Agent Lima had been assigned to the case as a result of the disclosure and had gone to work on it. Let it not be forgotten, as is shown by Record (pp. 3172, 3156) and Court of Appeals opinion, that the only reason this disclosure was not honored was not because of untimeliness but because the agents believed defendants could inform on persons who might be tax evaders and insisted, as the price of immunity, that they do so—"cooperate with their Government" (R. 3156) was the euphonious phrase they used. That noxious excrescence on the disclosure policy has spawned all this litigation. The policy invited the taxpayer to inform on himself alone, not on others.

Nor does the Supplement dispute our contention that counsel are now pressing upon this Court a point of disclosure law which was specifically disavowed in the trial court.

These are not minor points; they are as determinative of the issue as is our point that the Government cannot move for a partial new criminal trial; they would have been answered if counsel felt able so to do.

The Supplement and the Huebner Affidavit Were Not Diligently Presented.

It should be observed that neither the Supplement nor the Huebner affidavit makes any mention of when the Huebner evidence first came to the attention of the prosecutors. The documents are adroitly cast to leave an impression that all this is very recent and that the prosecutors have moved with diligence. Thus, the Supplement opens with the unctuous, but unspecific assurance that "The rapidly unfolding developments in this case require the filing of this Supplement * * *," and the affidavit is dated December 19, 1956. However, the record rather than demonstrating "rapid unfolding" shows that the Huebner evidence, whatever it may be, was in the possession of the prosecutors at least as early as August or September 1956, in ample time to have been included in the original Motion to Remand filed here in October 1956. Huebner's affidavit admits that he testified before the April 1956 Term Grand Jury but refrains from admitting when he did so. However, the affidavit of McAuliffe, attached to our Motion for Leave to Withdraw as Counsel, establishes that Huebner was before that Grand Jury last August or September, and Huebner swears that when there (Supp. p. 10) he testified "to these and other facts."

It is apparent that the prosecutors, rather than being diligent or frank, have been playing cat and mouse with the defendants and with the Court. Ultimately, fearing that the Amended Motion to Remand might be denied, they decided to produce an affidavit from Huebner, although presumably they could have procured one at any time in the last five or six months. Certainly they could have procured an order from the District Court under Criminal Rule 6 making Huebner's testimony before the Grand Jury available.

The Character of the Supplement.

Up to this point we have examined everything in the Supplement and the affidavit that is asserted to be material to the suppression question which is before the Court. That examination leads to two plain conclusions:

(1) The Supplement and the affidavit are obviously insufficient for the purpose for which they ostensibly are advanced.

(2) Both the Supplement and the affidavit contain many charges not material to the issue but of a type calculated to arouse animus against our clients.

If the prosecutors think they have a good case against our clients for these sundry offenses charged or inferred, they, of course, could procure indictments and endeavor to convict them. We of course think they should not do that; however the course is open to them. But it is grossly improper to attempt to reverse the present Court of Appeals judgment by innuendo of sundry misconduct.

When this case and its offshoots are viewed in perspective it will be seen that the Government's record is stained by repeated administrative excesses. Defendants have suffered from years of torture and improper Governmental action of which the Supplement is the mere culmination:

(a) The Treasury initially, and for years after the courts had ruled to the contrary, refused to recognize "black market" premiums on raw materials as a deduction from gross income (See Brief in Opposition to Certiorari, pp. 7-11). The whole controversy stems from this Treasury error of law. While no one can now recast events, we believe it is a certainty that had the Treasury ruled correctly as to what the tax law was at the time of the disclosure, or had it done so within the next few years, the whole course of events would have been greatly different and it is entirely probable that there would have been no indictment. Not until after indictment here did the Treasury bow to court rulings in this regard (See footnote 2, p. 7, Br. in Opp. to Certiorari).

(b) Three successive Secretaries of Treasury, (including one who became Chief Justice of the United States), and numerous lesser but highly placed and responsible officials, publicly promised immunity to those who would voluntarily disclose. Now the same Government, the Government that talks about "good faith" by defendants, says that its promise is valueless and need not be kept. It now seeks a conviction despite its promise. The immoral position of the Government still is that even if the disclosure was letter perfect that the most a citizen can get is a suppression order; that he still may be convicted; that a Cabinet Member's promise to the contrary is of no more value than a Russian treaty. The fraud here is not by the defendants—it is by faithless public officials toying with the liberty of citizens.

(c) When the criminal case failed in the Court of Appeals, the Treasury resorted to a jeopardy assessment and levy so vicious, arbitrary and fantastic as to be set aside as a violation of due process (App. III, Answer to Motion to Remand). Had this maneuver succeeded however, it would have been a death sentence for the corporate defendant and seriously embarrassed the individuals in their means of defense.

(d) Then the Grand Jury was resorted to and soon the Court of Appeals had to enter its order that the prosecutors and Treasury agents again had violated Constitutional guaranties and must hereafter act lawfully (App. II, Answer to Motion to Remand). And in an attempt to avoid that decision, prosecutor Russo told such serious untruths to the Court of Appeals that the Department was impelled to lodge an apology (Footnote 4, pp. 10-11, Answer to Motion to Remand).

(e) The original Motion to Remand filed here was so cast as to leave the impression that Director Sauber was dismissed from Governmental service because of official misconduct in connection with this case. That had to be corrected by an Amended Motion to Remand.

(f) The Amended Motion to Remand is based in substantial part on the Russo affidavit, in which the key sentence, designed to support the new and erroneous theory that Government agents got a "scent" on June 21, 1948, is a square inversion of truth (See Answer to Motion to Remand, pp. 29-31).

(g) Each time it appears likely this Court may rule, some new artifice appears: at the time it might have been assumed a ruling would come down on the certiorari application, the Solicitor General's letter of December 6, 1955, was filed; when it was possible that the Court might rule before adjourning the 1955 term, the letter of June 1, 1956, was filed; when our Answer to the Amended Motion to Remand was filed (December 22, 1956) and it was likely that a ruling would be made on it, the Supplement and Huebner's affidavit were filed. Perjury was first charged, then abandoned (See Point II, Answer to Motion to Remand, pp. 16 ff), now is asserted again in the face of the significant fact that although a Grand Jury has been in session for months, no perjury indictment has come down.[3] The Huebner affidavit goes only to the Motion to Remand for a further trial as to suppression issues, yet it is loaded with vicious assertions material, if at all, only to the merits of the case for which a new trial already has been ordered.

(h) The concluding paragraph of the Huebner affidavit contains a sentence which should not pass unnoticed—"I was not asked to testify at either the trial or suppression hearing because I had stated I would not lie on the stand." Although the sentence is peculiarly phrased and is susceptible of many meanings, one possible innuendo is that the distinguished and wholly honorable and respected lawyers, members of the bar of this Court, who represented Huebner and the Company at the suppression hearing and the hearing on the merits (and are not on this appeal), were guilty of a serious offense. It is apparent from the entire record that there was no occasion to call on Huebner on the suppression hearing. As to the hearing on the merits this Court may be assured that counsel of the standing of those who handled the case below did not deprive Huebner of the privilege of testifying if he wished to do so.

We respectfully suggest this record of endless and unfair harassment is long enough—only the courts stand between citizens and administrative harassment that in and of itself is destructive of freedom.

Conclusion.

It is respectfully submitted that the Motion to Remand should be denied. It is further submitted that the Supplement, the sole avowed purpose of which is to present the Huebner affidavit, is such a departure from proper criminal procedures that it should be stricken.

No. 10.

THE SHOTWELL MANUFACTURING COMPANY, BYRON A. CAIN AND HAROLD E. SULLIVAN.
Cross-Petitioners,

vs.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

MOTION THAT CONDITIONAL CROSS-PETITION FOR CERTIORARI BE TREATED AS AN UNCONDITIONAL CROSS-PETITION FOR CERTIORARI.

Now come The Shotwell Manufacturing Company, Byron A. Cain and Harold E. Sullivan by their attorneys, and respectfully move that the Conditional Cross-Petition for Certiorari heretofore filed on their behalf be treated as an unconditional Cross-Petition for Certiorari, and show:

1. When the Court of Appeals decision herein was made final in the late summer of 1955, this litigation was then some three and one-half years old and concerned, as to its merits, events that had occurred from eleven to nine years earlier. Cross-Petitioners either directly or through stock ownership in the Shotwell Company were involved in the series of civil cases referred to in In the Matter of the April 1956 Term Grand Jury, C. A. 7, November 13, 1956 (Appendix II, Answer to Motion to Remand), and were desirous of following that course of procedure which they were advised held most promise of enabling them to come to some early general settlement of their tax problems. They were advised, and believed, that the effect of the suppression order entered by the Court of Appeals would probably be to prevent a re-trial of the criminal case; that while the Court of Appeals decision did not give them the immunity they had been promised, nevertheless it would probably prevent further practical prosecution; that upon such assumption, voluntarily to seek further litigation in this Court by an unconditional application for certiorari might well serve to prolong, rather than to hasten, a final conclusion.

2. The present apparent willingness of the defendant Huebner to testify hereafter as a Government witness raises the possibility that the Government may attempt upon re-trial of this case, to prove a prima facie case through Huebner (the very man whose affidavit shows there was a disclosure and that it was timely), even though the evidence produced by defendants in reliance upon the Government's promise of immunity be suppressed, i. e., that the suppression order would be a fairly hollow victory. The Government now seems determined to press for a retrial some eleven-to thirteen years after the event. Such retrial would visit further harassment, crushing expense and emotional strain on citizens who already have been subjected to years of such treatment because the Government refused to honor its word. One of the obvious purposes of the Huebner affidavit is to convince the Court that defendants were guilty of tax evasion. But even if that should be assumed there is all the more reason to hold the Government to its solemn word not to prosecute, for the express purpose of the voluntary disclosure policy was to extend immunity to the presumptively guilty as well as to the innocent.

3. The Cross-Petition for Certiorari does not stand on the same footing as the Government's. The Government's should be denied and Cross-Petitioners' granted for the following reasons:

The Government asks certiorari on a question of no present public importance if it ever was such. It asks merely that this Court review the case to determine a detail of an abandoned disclosure policy under a non-recurring fact situation. On the other hand, the Cross-Petition presents a fundamental moral and legal question that always will be of deep and abiding public importance, namely, can the highest officials of the Executive Branch of the Government, who are authorized by statute (as no ordinary prosecutor is), to compromise criminal cases (Section 3761 Internal Revenue Code of 1939, quoted p. 13 Conditional Cross-Petition), make promises of immunity within the ambit of such statute, obtain much evidence as a result thereof (and a willingness to pay taxes), and then have the promised immunity subsequently repudiated by a bureaucracy which is heartless enough to prosecute citizens who have been naive enough to trust their government?.

4. Presently this nation is engaged in a campaign to convince the outside world that its word is good. Is this Government's word to be good to others but valueless to its own citizens? This Court has been alert, and properly so, to protect citizens who have been induced or coerced into making alleged confessions by improper actions of minor law enforcement officials. Is it to be less alert in protecting citizens who have relied on the word of highest Government officials acting under statutory authority, and whose word is subsequently repudiated by conscienceless tax gatherers?

5. The practical effect and the necessity for enforcement of the promised immunity is abundantly shown by the facts in the trial court record, as supplemented by the record here. For years Cross-Petitioners have been beset and harassed despite the promise that they would not be.

The relentless procedures in this Court have been unusual. The record here shows that one of the Cross-Petitioners has recently suffered severe heart attacks; while it is too early to tell what Cain's ultimate condition will be, men of experience can well fear that the strain of another trial might kill him.

6. Cross-Petitioners believe that their Cross-Petition, for the reasons set forth herein and in the Cross-Petition, is meritorious, that granting of it and entry of an ultimate order by this Court upholding the motion below to dismiss on the grounds of immunity might now prove to be the shortest way of bringing this litigation completely to a close. Indeed we believe it would be a sound exercise of this Court's plenary and supervisory jurisdiction to direct, without further ado, dismissal of the entire proceeding, because a criminal trial in 1957 or 1958 concerning events of 1944-1946 could not be fair and would make a mockery of the constitutional right to a speedy trial.

Petitioner,

vs.

THE SHOTWELL MANUFACTURING COMPANY, BYRON A. CAIN, AND HAROLD E. SULLIVAN.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

BRIEF FOR RESPONDENTS.

JURISDICTION.

Jurisdiction, asserted to lie under 28 U. S. C., Sec. 1254(1) giving this Court power to review, by certiorari, cases in the Courts of Appeal, is questioned:

This Court's order of February 25, 1957, in form granting certiorari "limited to the issues raised in the [Solicitor General's] amended motion to remand, etc.," was actually a denial of everything raised by the petition for certiorari and a granting of leave, at least temporarily, to present a wholly new motion here. If the Court proceeds with this cause on the question now presented an original motion to allow the prosecutors a partial new trial on the ground of allegedly newly discovered evidence it will not be reviewing anything that has been ruled on by the Court of Appeals. The practice heretofore has been for this Court not to entertain contested motions for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence but to refer them (assuming they show surface plausibility) to the appropriate Court of Appeals (Cf. U. S. v. Johnson, 319 U. S. 503, 327 U. S. 106. Mesarosh v. U. S., 352 U. S. 1, in which the Solicitor General confessed that a conviction might have been obtained erroneously, was the reverse of the situation at bar in which the prosecution seeks to validate a conviction).

QUESTIONS PRESENTED.

1. May the prosecution, after verdict of guilty in a criminal case, reopen the record and put in more evidence in an attempt to validate an otherwise invalid verdict?

2. If it be assumed that the prosecution may make a motion for a partial new trial, or for a new "determination" (Cf. Suppl. to Motion to Remand, p. 5), does the instant motion meet the tests of a motion for a new trial, of a new "determination," on the ground of newly discovered evidence?

Subsidiary Question.

3. Assuming that a motion of the kind involved may be made by a prosecutor, should it be presented here or to the Court of Appeals?

STATUTE INVOLVED.

28 U. S. C., Sec. 2106, giving this Court power to remand a case for further proceedings, is not involved because it only defines the various orders this Court may enter in a case properly before it on review. It is not a grant of original jurisdiction.

STATEMENT.

The Statement tendered by the Solicitor General roams the record at large and contains much material which is wholly irrelevant to the issue posed by this Court's order of February 25, 1957, limiting consideration to the issue raised, not by the petition for certiorari, but by the Amended Motion to Remand and Answer thereto. We therefore tender the following:

Proceedings Below.

Respondents to the Motion to Remand were indicted in 1952 for alleged falsity in the income tax returns of Shotwell Mfg. Co. (now named Homan Mfg. Co.) for 1945 and 1946. They asserted, by motion to dismiss, immunity from prosecution because in February, 1948, acting in reliance upon repeated promises of immunity from criminal prosecution by Secretaries of the Treasury and other authorized officials to those who voluntarily disclosed tax irregularities before investigation was initiated, they had voluntarily disclosed such to Ernest J. Sauber, then Chief Deputy Collector (subsequently District Director of Internal Revenue in Chicago). The motion was denied by the District Court (and subsequently by the Court of Appeals) upon the ground that even though Executive officials had promised immunity, their promise was not judicially enforceable.

After the motion to dismiss had been overruled in the District Court, respondents, before trial, moved to suppress evidence which they had produced for the Treasury in reliance on its promises of immunity. A hearing was held and evidence was taken on this motion. The motion to suppress was denied in the District Court, trial ensued, and respondents were convicted. Upon appeal the Court of Appeals, without passing upon numerous other asserted errors, set aside the convictions on the ground that the motion to suppress should have been allowed and directed a retrial of the case.

The Certiorari Applications.

The Solicitor General sought certiorari for review of the Court of Appeals decision (and respondents filed a conditional cross petition). Such review was denied by this Court's orders of February 25, 1957. It is for this reason that we say much of the "Statement" in the Government's brief, constituting as it does a subtle argument that there were factors which might have warranted certiorari, is irrelevant and serves only to confuse the present issue. A restatement, we believe, is necessary to place in proper focus the motion that is before the Court:

The gist of the indictment and Government proof as to the merits of the case was that in 1945 and 1946 Shotwell Mfg. Co., a Chicago candy manufacturer, received approximately $400,000 unreported income by way of cash "premiums" or "overages" above ceiling prices on sales of candy to one David Lubben (or companies he controlled) of New York. Shotwell was a substantial company and actually paid $827,000 taxes for those years (see indictment figures R. 5). The gist of the defense was that Lubben had paid cash premiums for a portion of that time but in a far smaller amount (approximately $160,000) than he claimed; that this gross income had been expended by the company in payment of over ceiling "premiums" on raw corn which was then sold to corn refiners at ceiling prices, with the refiners in turn selling a portion of the resulting corn syrup, necessary to the manufacture of Shotwell's candies, to Shotwell at ceiling;' that no net income resulted from the transactions. Although the law was clear at the time of trial (1953) that Shotwell's over-ceiling expenditures for raw materials could be taken as a deduction against its over-ceiling receipts, it had been the Treasury's position (IT 3724, 1945 Cum. Bul. 57: 1949—1CB6) at the time of the voluntary disclosure (1948) and the indictment (1952), that such expenditures, no matter how well proved, were not deductible.

The Government's star witness at the trial was Lubben. Judge Nordbye[2] found Lubben to be a credible witness but subsequent events and judicial decisions have proved him to be a self-confessed perjurer and a swindler.[3]

1. During 1945 and the first half of 1946 the ceiling price on corn became greatly deranged with respect to that on hogs and farmers, finding it more profitable to use their corn for feed than to sell it at ceiling prices, withdrew it from the open market (R. 2372, 2376 7, 2419 22). The government itself, through the Commodity Credit Corporation, began buying corn at 30c a bushel, over ceiling prices (R. 2420, 2682, 2709, Def. Ex. 74). The candy trade generally found it necessary to engage in over-ceiling "corn deals" in order to get sufficient quantities of corn syrup from the corn refiners (R. 1790). Shotwell has never been accused of being in the black market generally its only over-ceiling sales were to Lubben and for the purpose, so we contend, of getting unrecorded cash which it could spend for unrecorded premiums on corn without alerting O. P. A. inspectors to whom its books were open.

2. Judge Nordbye was specially assigned to the Northern District of Illinois to hear the case because one of respondents is a brother of one of the Northern Illinois District Judges.

3. The District Attorney for the Southern District of New York describes Lubben as follows: "* * * a perjurer and a black marketeer and practically anything else you want to talk about, though I don't know of any income tax violation that he was guilty of. * * * He certainly did not admit any. He certainly admitted many other crimes." (See Giglio v. U. S., No. 10 this term, R. 2589.) In re Identification of Persons Involved.

Respondents Cain and Sullivan were large stockholders in Shotwell and were its principal officers. Cain testified at both the suppression hearing and the main hearing; Sullivan at only the latter. Leon Busby, asserted by the motion to remand to have perjured himself, is an independent auditor who regularly audited Shotwell's books and prepared its tax returns; he testified as a defense witness at the suppression hearing, as a government witness at the main hearing. Frank Huebner, a defendant who now wishes to "cooperate" with the Treasury agents, was Shotwell's factory manager and a titular officer; he physically received most of the cash payments of overages which Lubben made; he did not testify. Stanley Gratlund, whose affidavit was filed August 19, 1957, was Shotwell's comptroller; he testified briefly as a defense witness at the suppression hearing, at length as a government witness on the main hearing. Ernest Sauber in 1948 was Chief Deputy Collector of Internal Revenue in Chicago; and subsequently was made Director for the area; he was removed from office on August 6, 1956, after Treasury hearings in which he was accused of wrongdoing in this case (see App. I to Answer to Mo. to Remand) but no finding was made against him in this regard and his removal was ordered on "unrelated charges" (Ftn. 4, Mo. to Rem.); he testified as a government witness at the suppression hearing.

The Facts as to the Voluntary Disclosure.

Carlsen, 17 N. J. 338, 111 A. 2d 393, shows Lubben in a distillery swindle in Puerto Rico in 1951. State v. Wilcox, 34 N. J. Super. 267, 112 A. 2d 23, 25, again shows his penchant for perjury.

In sum, the opinion shows that about March 15, 1948 Busby and Cain disclosed the nature of the Shotwell irregularities to Sauber;[4] they were told by Sauber to assemble such data as they could to indicate the transactions and that an agent would be assigned to investigate and substantiate the matter. The record is undisputed that Busby went on a month's vacation and that after his return Cain began complaining that the work was dragging; that ultimately Shotwell personnel were assembled and from the record of sales to Lubben, and other data "recapitulations" of the unrecorded transactions were prepared as an aid to the revenue agent in going about his work. In these sheets, in order to avoid argument, the overages were listed at the amounts it was then believed Lubben, upon inquiry, would claim them to have been (respondents meantime having had access to some of his books), rather than the lower amounts respondents contended were involved."

Although neither side tried, at either the suppression, or the main hearing, to fix the precise date when these recapitulations were finally compiled, it was apparent from the context of the testimony and continuity of events that it necessarily had to be in June or July 1948. Likewise there was, and is, no dispute but that agent Lima was assigned to audit the matter on July 30, 1948 (R. 3173), solely as a result of respondents' disclosure; and there was, and is, no dispute but that when agent Lima actually commenced his work he was tendered complete "recapitulations" which listed every unrecorded transaction with

4. The disclosure, as permitted by Treasury announcements was oral. ("The simple statement that 'I have filed false tax returns and I want to make the Government whole' would constitute a complete disclosure." Treasury release, May 14, 1947, R. 3136); no one made a memorandum of it; this was agreed to at the hearing (R. 445). Busby and Cain fixed the time as late January 1948, Sauber as about March 15, 1948. The court accepted the latter date.

Lubben. Likewise there was, and is, no dispute that the only reason that the Treasury did not make an assessment and close the matter without prosecution was, as the Court of Appeals puts it, that respondents did not turn "informer" and disclose the identity of the recipients of Shotwell's black market payouts, for which "payouts" the Treasury insisted it would allow no deduction.

Against the foregoing background it is now asserted that the Government should have a "new" or "further" trial of the suppression issue because, it is asserted, newly discovered evidence tends to show that the disclosure did not occur until July 1948 and that Busby, Sauber and Cain gave perjurious evidence, of which the record should be "cleansed," when they placed it in the January March 1948 period.

Reduced to lowest terms, the essential logic of the prosecutors' present position is: "We assert that because we now have direct evidence that the explanatory 'schedule or 'recapitulations' of the Lubben transactions were not finally prepared until July 1948, and because Grafund and Hiebner say they did not know about it until about that time, it follows that the disclosure was not made in March." The non sequitur is apparent. Moreover, there is nothing "new" about the fact that the recapitulations were not prepared until July.

The 1956 Grand Jury, After an 11 Month Investigation, Refused to Indict Anyone for Perjury in This Disclosure.

The outstanding omission of the "Statement" in the Government's brief is its failure to inform the Court cleanly and squarely that the much vaunted investigation, grand jury and otherwise, on the strength of which the Department of Justice has secured considerable delay in this Court, has resulted in no indictment at anytime for perjury with respect to the suppression issues herein.

The April 1956 Term grand jury for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, specially impaneled to investigate this case and acting under the guidance of special attorneys dispatched from Washington, returned its indictment on February 27, 1957, two days after this Court had entered its orders which had the effect of denying certiorari. Copy of the indictment appears as an appendix hereto. In lurid, but unspecific terms it makes grave charges against respondents which they deny but which they will have to meet. However, it does not indict Busby or Sauber for perjury at all; counts Six to Ten are perjury counts against Cain, but these counts go to differences between Cain's testimony and Labbe's on the trial on the merits — details or items of evidence not material to the question now raised.

Artfully worded footnote 17 to the Government's brief, [fn. 17] "* * * an indictment was returned * * * charging, among other things, that Cain and Sullivan gave perjured testimony at the trial of this case" conceals what it should reveal: that the perjury charged by the grand jury is not material to the pending issues. The refusal of the grand jury to indict Cain or Busby or Sauber for perjury in connection with the disclosure came after it had heard and evaluated (as is now shown by the Aug. 21-30, 1956 entry in the "Chronology" attached to the Government brief), the witnesses Hughes and Gotthard whose truncated affidavits nevertheless are offered to this Court as prima facie evidence of perjury at the suppression hearing.[5]

5. We are aware that some of the alleged overt acts of the conspiracy count of the indictment come close to allegations of perjury. But the specifying of overt acts is by no means the equivalent of a direct charge or an indictment on the matter covered by the alleged overt act. The telltale distinction is that it is not necessary that all the overt acts charged be proved, or be proved as laid.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT.

The motion, although labeled as a mere Motion to Remand, is far more than that: It is a motion by the Government, in a criminal case, for a further, supplemental or new hearing by which it seeks to add new or supplementary evidence to the existing record in an attempt to validate an invalid verdict of "guilty" already obtained. Such a motion is not merely "unusual" as the Government brief confesses, but is unprecedented in the criminal jurisprudence of the country. The Government cannot have a new trial in a criminal case on the ground of newly discovered evidence. To grant such a right would be to defy the wisdom of centuries and open the door for endless, vindictive harassment. The oft-repeated proclamation of perjury in a Government lawyer's brief cannot create the right of a second chance to attempt to convict people, which both the common law and Congress have failed to provide.

If perjury was committed below the Government was not without remedy—it could have procured an indictment therefor. Its inability to get such an indictment makes the present claims of perjury hollow indeed.

The assertion by Government counsel that this is not a case where one party, having failed to convince a court of the soundness of his position, seeks to remand merely to bolster his case by additional evidence, but rather is one where the Government seeks an opportunity to have "excised" from the record respondents' asserted perjury, is wholly specious because the whole thrust of the motion is to add new evidence to the old record and, all else laid aside, the so-called "excision" of alleged perjury could not take place in any event unless the testimony was judicially found to be perjury. Decision on such an issue would involve a new trial and a new determination in every sense of the word.

Even if it be assumed that the Government in a criminal case can move for a partial new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence, it could do so only by meeting the tests uniformly applied in all cases, civil or criminal, where a new trial or new determination is sought on the ground of newly discovered evidence: the movant must show that the evidence could not have been earlier discovered, that he has been diligent, that the evidence goes to a material, controlling point rather than being merely impeaching or affecting credibility, and will probably lead to a different result. The evidence tendered here meets none of these tests nor does the Government brief claim that it does; moreover, it is proffered in support of a theory as to "timeliness" of the disclosure that is legally unsound, and that was specifically disclaimed below.

In any event, if it be assumed that a motion of this kind may be made by the Government in a criminal case, it should be presented to the Court of Appeals rather than to this Court. The Court of Appeals decision not being under review for error, this Court has no independent jurisdiction to set the Court of Appeals mandate aside and send the case back to the District Court.

ARGUMENT.

I.

A PROSECUTOR CANNOT MOVE FOR A PARTIAL NEW TRIAL IN ORDER TO VALIDATE A CONVICTION ALREADY OBTAINED.

Our position that the kind of motion here attempted, even if diligently made and supported by the strongest affidavits, cannot be made by a prosecutor, is set forth in the "Answer to the Motion (Amended) to Remand," p. 13 ff. The Government brief (p. 31) confesses that the "motion is unusual." The confession is a gross understatement: the motion is unprecedented in the criminal jurisprudence of the country. To countenance it would be to open the doors to piecemeal criminal litigation and endless harassments by prosecutors.

We are compelled to investigate new fields: We find no case precisely in point on the facts but several which indicate appropriate correct principles. Although the precise limits of the constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy have never been marked out (Cf. Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U. S. 319, 322), what is attempted here is probably not a literal violation of the prohibition because the jury verdict was one of guilty. (Cf. Kepner v. U. S., 195 U. S. 100, but compare U. S. v. Zisblatt, 2 Cir., 172 F. 2d 740, certification dismissed, 336 U. S. 934, and Sapir v. U. S., 348 U. S. 373.) What is attempted is worse in many aspects than the usual jeopardy case for the prosecutors seek to retain the old guilty verdict through the device of adding to the existing record.

Although the motion is labeled as a mere Motion to Remand, it is far more than that: It is a motion by the Gov ernment for a new trial of the suppression branch of the case, a branch on which defendants had not asked a new trial in the Court of Appeals and as to which defendants had raised only points of law.

As early as 1799, in the Case of Vrigs, Fed. Case No. 5126, it was recognized that the Government cannot have a new trial in a criminal case on good or bad grounds. Rule 33 of the Rules of Criminal Procedure provides only that "the court may grant a new trial to a defendant if required in the interests of justice." This is a codification of the established rule that the Government cannot move for a new trial in a criminal case. In U. S. v. Sanges, 144 U. S. 310, 312, this Court said:

> "And from the time of Lord Hale to that of Goldwick's Case, just cited, the textbooks, with hardly an exception, either assume or assert that the defendant (or his representative) is the only party who can have either a new trial or a writ of error in a criminal case."

This Court went on to point out that although in some states decisions denying a writ of error to the State after a verdict of acquittal had done so on the grounds that it would constitute double jeopardy, the courts of many states had denied the right upon broader grounds viz. such right does not exist in the absence of statute. This Court further said at page 318, after reviewing many authorities:

> "In many of the States, indeed, including some of those above mentioned, the right to sue out a writ of error, or to take an appeal in the nature of a writ of error, in criminal cases, has been given to the State by positive statute. But the decisions above cited conclusively show that under the common law, as generally understood and administered in the United States, and in the absence of any statute expressly giving the right to the State, a writ of error cannot be sued out in a criminal case after a final judgment in favor of the defendant, whether that judgment has been rendered ket dealing "at which time Busby displayed surprise and complete ignorance of these transactions." The brief writers have stretched Graflund's language considerably for the affidavit contains only the negative statement that "he [Busby] gave no indication to me that he had known about the matter previously."

Busby testified (as a defense witness at the suppression hearing (R. 170) and as a Government witness on the main hearing (R. 1826-7)), that in early January 1948 Cain sent him and Graflund to New York to investigate Lubben's actual financial position, with respect to a $50,000 loan Lubben was then requesting Shotwell to make him; that on that trip he and Graflund examined Lubben's books and Graflund informed him that over-ceiling payments had been made by Lubben to Shotwell; that promptly upon returning to Chicago he (Busby) brought the matter up with Cain and Sullivan and that this led to the disclosure.

Graflund's affidavit contradicts Busby's testimony that he and Busby talked about the over-ceiling transactions in January 1948, but it does not in any way contradict Busby's, Cain's and Sullivan's material testimony that in any event Busby was fully informed about these transactions by the latter two in January 1948 and was instructed by them to, and did, make the disclosure. The Graflund affidavit therefore cannot rise to the dignity of direct contradiction on the material issue. The most that can be said for it is that it is a contradiction which might tend to impeach the credibility of Busby. That is insufficient as a basis for a new trial.

The inherent weakness of the Graflund affidavit (as well as the Huebner affidavit) is disclosed by the following statement in it: "Prior to this time, so far as I know, no work had been done by anyone to assemble records, etc." The brief writers cite no authority for their unstated major premise that alleged absence of knowledge of a fact by one who need not necessarily have known of it, proves that the fact did not exist.

That Graflund was not taken into the complete confidence of Cain and Sullivan and told everything they were doing is amply shown by the previous record in two ways: First, Lubben's financial troubles had started in 1947 and Shotwell had guaranteed a $75,000 bank loan for him. This was a major transaction, yet Graflund had not been consulted or had any connection with it (R. 1757, 1774). Second, although sent East with Busby in 1948 to ascertain Lubben's financial condition with respect to the requested $50,000 loan, Graflund had no recollection as to whether he had been told how large a loan it was that Lubben was seeking (R. 1779).

The respondents Cain and Sullivan are men of prominence, pride and reputation in the Chicago area (R. 2686-2705) and were "ashamed" that they were involved in a combined O.P.A. and tax difficulty (R. 2605). There is no reason to suppose they would tell anyone they absolutely did not have to precisely what they were gathering information for.

It is respectfully submitted that if is quite clear that the affidavits of Huebner and Graflund (for all of the prejudicial material inserted in them), do not rise to the dignity of the clear, direct and striking proof on a matter material to the issue under consideration that would warrant a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence if presented by a convicted defendant.

This brings us back to counsel's contention that they do not have to meet the tests that a convicted defendant must meet in order to get a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. What reasons do they give? The primary one is set forth at page 37, where they say:

> "A real concern in the usual new evidence case is whether granting a retrial would, in effect, vest > the power to set aside the conviction, not in the court, but in those proffering the evidence. For example, the courts consider whether such action would enable and encourage defendants to join with prosecution witnesses in automatically setting aside a conviction by production of a 'recantation'. See People v. Shilitano, 218 N. Y. 161, 169. No such considerations obtain where as here, the newly discovered evidence serves to preserve rather than vitiate the verdict of the jury."

As we understand this passage, counsel say that courts are fearful that if new trials on the grounds of newly discovered evidence were freely granted, the convicted person frequently would intimidate prosecution witnesses and produce "recantations". No such considerations obtain, so they say, when the Government is trying to validate a verdict.

We do not think this asserted "concern," although it well may exist in some cases, is the basic reason why new trials are not readily granted on claims of newly discovered evidence. However, counsel's position ignores the fact that governments, peopled as they are, and always have been, by some functionaries who are over-zealous or over-ambitious, may produce "recantations" or "impeachments" on an issue they lost, by threatening witnesses with seizure of all their world goods through a jeopardy fraud assessment, or by threatening to indict them for crimes. As witness the following questionable chain of events:

In 1952 respondents were indicted on the theory that Shotwell received over $400,000 from Lubben. The Shotwell people had never conceded any such figure was true, and in 1951 Cain went to Lubben and asked him to "tell the truth about the barter deals we have had" (deals on which Lubben claimed he had paid cash overages but on which Shotwell contended candy had been made available at ceiling in exchange for raw material, principally chocolate, at ceiling). Cain's version is at R. 2565, that of Lubben's lawyer Davidson, testifying as a Government witness, is at R. 1326-7, 1336. Lubben insisted he had paid premiums on all transactions, and principally to or through Huebner — that if there was a difference between what Lubben claimed he had paid and Shotwell admitted it received, Cain "ought to have [Huebner] down to the cellar and make him give back the money because he had stolen from his partners" (Davidson, R. 1336).

It may be, as Lubben's lawyer Davidson claimed in 1951, that Huebner had transactions of some kind with Lubben and put money in his own pocket that the Shotwell executives knew nothing about; that he did, to some extent unknown to them, "steal from his partners," as Lubben claimed. To the degree this may be true, Huebner may owe, or be claimed to owe, very substantial back taxes. If the transactions started as early as 1944, as Huebner's affidavit seems to say and as Lubben claimed, he owes whatever the additional tax may be for that year plus (as of this writing) 50% penalty, plus 72% interest, and so on for successive years. The temptation on a man in such position to dissemble is strong indeed. It does not require much imagination to see what a powerful weapon this situation would provide someone endeavoring to get an affidavit believed to be helpful to the Treasury's case. And no experienced person will believe that Treasury detectives, smarting under the defeat of losing a case, are less dexterous or more timid in using the weapons that come to hand than are detectives the world over.

But, whatever the fact as to that may be, the rule against allowing a new judicial determination on the grounds of newly discovered evidence does not rest on the narrow basis posed by Government counsel, viz., considerations peculiarly applicable to persons convicted of crime. The upon a verdict of acquittal, or upon a determination by the court of an issue of law. In either case, the defendant, having been once put upon his trial and discharged by the court, is not to be again vexed for the same cause, unless the legislature, acting within its constitutional authority, has made express provision for a review of the judgment at the instance of the government."

There is no statute which gives the Government the right to move for a partial new trial in a criminal case on any grounds. The oft repeated proclamation of perjury in a lawyer's brief cannot supply the right of a second chance to try that Congress has failed to give. There is nothing anomalous about such a result. It stems from the fact that our law always has recognized the peril of allowing prosecutors or administrative officials to prosecute endlessly, and that the Government, in a criminal case, has only such rights as are given to it by the common law and the Congress, acting within constitutional limitations.

A defendant in a criminal case has, and rightly so, many rights which the Government does not have. For example, a defendant may appeal to a reviewing court after a conviction, but the Government never can after an acquittal. A supposed criminal by committing perjury may escape punishment for a crime which he committed in fact, but the Government, even though it showed the perjury beyond shadow of a doubt, cannot retry him for the original offense. U. S. v. Ball, 163 U. S. 662; Kepner v. U. S., 195 U. S. 100. It has the right in such a situation to indict and endeavor to convict for perjury. Here, respondents had the right, after judgment of conviction, to urge the reviewing court that the lower court erred in denying the motion to suppress. However, had the trial court in the instant case sustained a motion to suppress, the Government could not have appealed from such an order. (U. S. v. Rosenwasser, 9 Cir., 145 F. 2d 1015; U. S. v. Janitz, 3 Cir., 161 F. 2d 19.)

Other examples come to mind: Trial courts may erroneously exclude evidence offered by the Government resulting in the freeing of the defendant by the jury, but the Government is remediless in such a situation and the defendant cannot be retried. Examples might be multiplied, but the foregoing are sufficient to illustrate the point that the Government's rights to a new trial, or to relief from a reviewing court, do not coincide with those of a convicted defendant's.

It is asserted that all that is sought is to "cleanse" the record of what is asserted to be perjury (G. Br., p. 34), but much more is involved: First, the prosecutors wish to raise a wholly new timeliness theory, which they disclaimed below (See Answer, p. 19 ff.) and for which no tenable legal theory ever could have been, or is now advanced; Second, no simple automatic "striking" or "cleansing" could occur because Sauber, Busby and Cain insist that their testimony was true, and the April 1956 Grand Jury that investigated the case did not find probable cause for accusing them of perjury. Consequently, if the motion was granted, a full new adversary hearing, with rulings as to the materiality and sufficiency of the allegedly "new" evidence; if a material issue developed, the weighing of evidence pro and con (We do not concede that any of the proffered evidence is material to show an untimely disclosure under the so-called "Wenchell objective test," Ans. to Mo. to Rem. p. 19 ff.); and a new "determination" (as the prosecutors put it at page 5 of their "Supplement to Motion to Remand") would be required. That is precisely the endless, piecemeal prosecution that is repugnant to our system of justice.

If it was true that Cain or Busby or Sauber perjured themselves in the respects charged, they could have been indicted and, if proved guilty, punished. Justice and purity of the courts (assuming they have been defiled) need not go unavenged; but, as we have seen, the Grand Jury which investigated this case refused to return perjury indictments of this kind.

Finally, we believe a very practical word may be added. It is well known that the Treasury Department has, at least in recent years, embraced the so-called policy of "relentless prosecution" in criminal cases; has accepted the theory that it is in the interests of the collection of the revenue to overlook potential cases in which it believes there is a doubt as to whether a conviction is obtainable, but to prosecute "relentlessly" those in which it believes it will obtain convictions. The supposed advantage of this policy is that it tends to make the mere threat of a criminal case a weapon of terror and potency in securing taxes. The wisdom of that policy, of course, is a question to be determined in Executive, and not in Judicial, circles. But when administrators attempt to carry that policy of never losing to the point where the established safeguards of judicial procedures are sought to be set at naught, as is here the case, they are beyond their province and must be checked by the courts.

And if it should be that all the criminal litigation against these respondents should evaporate, the revenue would still not be in danger, for the Government has ample means under the civil laws to collect the tax, if any, that may be owing, and presumably to do so with penalties, and certainly with interest.

II.

THE LEGAL THEORY OF THE MOTION, VIZ., THAT THE DISCLOSURE WAS NOT TIMELY, IS INCORRECT, WAS CONCEDED TO BE ERRONEOUS IN THE DISTRICT COURT, AND NEVER WAS PRESENTED TO THE COURT OF APPEALS.

In the confusion of the various briefs and the varying theories that have been offered by successive Government counsel, the following salient and indisputable facts must not be lost sight of:

Respondents, whether in January-February 1948 as they contend, or in July 1948 as the prosecutors now contend, did in fact make a disclosure (a) to a proper official of the Bureau of Internal Revenue; (b) of all of their transactions with Lubben; (c) before the Treasury had initiated any independent investigation of Shotwell, and (d) this disclosure led to the assigning of a Treasury agent (Joseph Lima) on July 31, 1948 (R. 3173) to audit the accounts with the aid of "recapitulations" furnished him by respondents, which listed every single transaction that has since been called into question; and (e) the only reason ever assigned for dishonoring the promise of immunity was that respondents would not "inform" on the recipients of their payouts.

These facts were made clear in our Answer to the Motion (Amended) to Remand (see pages 5 and 6, footnote 3, pages 19-24). They have not been, and cannot be gainsaid. The present brief for the United States does not do so and does not point out any theory which would make this disclosure untimely.

Instead of stating and defending a specific theory of "untimeliness", instead of attempting to show that the treasury ever did initiate an investigation of Shotwell independent of that flowing from the disclosure (it cannot), the brief endeavors to slide around the point by stating that "this is not the proper forum to pass, in the first instance, on this and other aspects of the timeliness issue." But the matter is not that simple. The question is whether at this remote stage of the case the prosecutors can inject a new timeliness issue or theory, and whether the issue or theory they seek to inject is even prima facie sound.

The timeliness theory expressed for the first time in the Motion to Remand, which the brief does not now attempt to support, was that since the New York Revenue Office, in the course of investigating Lubben, asked a Chicago agent on June 21, 1948 to verify some of Lubben's transactions from Shotwell records, that the Revenue Service received a "clue" that might have led to Shotwell (it did not), and hence a disclosure, assuming it occurred after the receipt of such "clue", would be untimely. But this is all factually, as well as legally, unsupportable:

The facts shown by the Revenue Agent Krane's own report appearing at record 3166-7 are simply that on June 21, 1948, New York agents, investigating Lubben, requested Chicago agent Krane to verify or check information on Lubben by obtaining certain invoices and other data from Shotwell. Krane did this. His report of July 1, 1948, prepared for transmission to New York, appears at R. 3161 ff. Nothing further happened with respect to Shotwell as a result of this June 21, 1948 call.

Krane's report of August 30, 1950 (R. 3166 ff.) also shows that on August 20, 1948, Close & Co. of Chicago, another candy manufacturer which had dealt with Lubben, made a disclosure that came to the attention of Intelligence agents in Chicago. On August 31, 1948, Intelligence officers of the Chicago office wrote to the New York Intelligence Office suggesting that possibly Shotwell had received over-invoice payments from Lubben similar to those Close & Co. had received. The Chicago Office requested the New York Office to make appropriate inquiries of Lubben. The New York Office replied on September 13 that it was informed that Shotwell had made a disclosure to the Revenue Agents' Office in Chicago. The Chicago Intelligence Agents then inquired of their brothers in the Revenue Agents' Office and found out that Lima was already conducting his examination.

The theory that merely getting a clue (at whatever date), in the course of investigating Lubben that might ultimately have led to an investigation of Shotwell-marked the "initiation of investigation" of Shotwell was specifically and properly disclaimed by the Department of Justice in the District Court (R. 441, 445) and could not be raised here (Helvering v. Minnesota Tea Co., 296 U. S. 378, 380) even if it was legally sound—which it plainly is not.

"Timeliness" of a voluntary disclosure, i. e., whether it was made before investigation had been "initiated", is determined by the so-called "Wenchel objective test" for determining "initiation of investigation" which is:

> "An investigation is initiated when a special agent, an internal revenue agent, a deputy collector, or other Bureau officer, is assigned a return for examination, or when an investigating officer has requested advice of appropriate officers of the Bureau with respect to the filing of a return or the payment of taxes." (Treasury release, May 14, 1947, R. 3132-3136.)

The theory advanced in the trial court was that the "timeliness date" was December 16, 1947 when, so it was first asserted, the Shotwell return was assigned for "audit" in the Chicago office. However, the proof showed without dispute that the return was not then assigned for "audit" but merely routinely assigned for "survey" as to whether it should be audited (R. 393-6). The December 16, 1947 theory has long since disappeared.

There is no dispute about these facts and they lead inevitably to the conclusion that the disclosure, whether in early 1948 as respondents contend, or in July 1948 as the prosecutors now contend, was timely. The only investigation of Shotwell's affairs that was undertaken flowed from the disclosure and no independent investigation ever was undertaken. No step inconsistent with full recognition of a valid disclosure was taken until September 1950 when the Intelligence Unit requested that "a case jacket be issued" simply because Shotwell's officers "refused" to identify the recipients of the over-ceiling disbursements for which the Treasury insisted then and for some years thereafter it would allow no deduction (R. 3172).

III.

IF IT BE ASSUMED THAT THE GOVERNMENT CAN MOVE FOR A PARTIAL NEW TRIAL, THE SHOWING IN SUPPORT OF THE MOTION SO UTTERLY FAILS TO MEET APPLICABLE TESTS THAT IT MUST BE DENIED.

Government counsel appreciate that the showing that they have made in support of the motion, if tested by the rules applicable to a motion by a convicted defendant for a new trial on the grounds of newly discovered evidence, is so utterly inadequate that it would be denied out of hand. Therefore, they claim that it does not have to meet those tests, saying:

> "Contrary to respondents' assertion (Answer 13-16) the Government is not seeking a new trial, and authorities with respect to the granting of retrials on the grounds of newly discovered evidence have no application here. The considerations which are relevant when a defendant seeks to have a verdict set aside because of new evidence tending to negate guilt are entirely inapposite here. In this case, the newly discovered evidence supports the conviction—which was set aside by the Court of Appeals—and all of the perjury adduced below was in support of a defense contention which was accepted by the Court of Appeals." (Br. 36.)

Counsel never do say what kind of a showing must be made in support of a motion such as theirs, but, judging by the showing actually made, it entails no more than reiterating frequently the charge of perjury and adducing of affidavits tending to impeach the testimony of witnesses who testified to a non-decisive occurrence or a few of the details relating to it.

To put the matter another way: counsel are contending for a double standard. The Government, so they say, which is attempting to send citizens to the penitentiary in violation of their constitutional rights (according to the Court of Appeals), has to make some undefined, but lesser showing than a citizen who is trying to escape the penitentiary on the grounds that newly discovered evidence will show he was innocent.

The mere statement of that evil proposition contains its self-refutation. The fact that a convicted defendant is trying to upset a jury verdict while the Government is here trying to hang onto one, to which counsel attribute such legal significance, is legally irrelevant.

The leading case as to when a defendant may secure a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is U. S. v. Johnson, 7 Cir., 142 F. 2d 588, which collects many authorities and in which Judge Minton said at p. 592:

> "Having decided that there was no recantation or false swearing by Goldstein, the District Court then considered the case as any other motion for a new trial on newly discovered evidence would be considered. On such consideration, the court found that the rule for such motions 'has never been better nor more succinctly stated than' in Berry v. State of Georgia, 10 Ga. 511, which he quoted as follows:
> "'Upon the following points there seems to be a pretty general concurrence of authority, viz: that it is incumbent on a party who asks for a new trial, on the ground of newly discovered evidence, to satisfy the Court, 1st. That the evidence has come to his knowledge since the trial. 2d. That it was not owing to the want of due diligence that it did not come sooner. 3rd. That it is so material that it would probably produce a different verdict, if the new trial were granted. 4th. That it is not cumulative only—viz.:—speaking to facts, in relation to which there was evidence on the trial. 5th. That the affidavit of the witness himself should be produced, or its absence accounted for.

> And 6th, a new trial will not be granted, if the only object of the testimony is to impeach the character or credit of a witness." (Italics added.)

Here the only avowed object of the so-called newly discovered evidence is merely to impeach a part of Busby's testimony, and perhaps that as to Cain, as to certain facts not directly, but perhaps circumstantially, militating against their testimony as to when the disclosure was made.

The Government does not pretend there has been any change or recantation by any of the three participants to the disclosure; nor that it has direct evidence that the disclosure was not made when the participants say it was. The brief on the contrary with its extravagant charges of perjury, relies almost exclusively on the affidavits of Huebner and Graflund. That these affidavits contain nothing warranting a vacation of the Court of Appeals judgment and a remand of the case we now show:

The "Supplement to Motion to Remand" asserts (p. 4) only that Huebner will testify on three points.

(1) That Lubben made over-ceiling payments from November, 1944, to December, 1946, rather than from September, 1945, to June, 1946, as defendants asserted. This goes solely to the merits of the case. This question was in no way involved in the suppression hearing. It has no bearing on the timeliness of the disclosure, and therefore may be disregarded.

(2) That during the first six months of 1948 no one "mentioned" to Huebner (Suppl. p. 8) that a disclosure had been made; that in July, 1948, he was at the meeting with Shotwell staff people in the Belden-Stratford Hotel at which the recapitulations were prepared "so that a disclosure could be made"; that prior to this, "so far as he knows," no work was done by anyone relative to compiling data "for the purpose of making a voluntary disclosure"; that he was "given to understand" the date would be set at June 15, 1948. It is said (Suppl. p. 4) that this contradicts suppression testimony by auditor Busby that Huebner was at a meeting in late January at which it was decided to make a disclosure, and by Cain that Huebner "possibly" was there.[6] And it does. But it does not contradict the testimony of Busby, Cain and Sauber that the disclosure in fact was made in the January-March period, that Sauber told them to assemble figures to assist the agents who would make an audit or investigation (R. 178, 182, 232), that this work "dragged" and that finally Cain assembled the staff and got the job done (R. 323).

Neither Busby nor Cain in lengthy testimony as to the events leading up to the disclosure and as to the work done in assembling figures thereafter, mentioned Huebner as playing any part until the staff met to assist in putting together the final recapitulations, except that Busby gave a single answer (R. 176) that Huebner was present when Cain made the decision to disclose, while Cain at one point said Huebner "possibly" was (R. 228-9) and at another excluded him (R. 249). In fact however, Huebner, even according to Government witness Davidson (R. 1315 ff.), had been sent as a messenger to Lubben in February 1948 to get, and he got, some of Lubben's records to take to Chicago "to correct or conform the Shotwell books, because they had no—there were some entries missing on their books" (R. 1321).[7]

6. It may be noted that at one point Cain said Huebner was "possibly" there (R. 228-9); at another he identified only himself and Sullivan as being at this particular session with Busby (R. 249). This is indicative of the fact that the witnesses were endeavoring, within the limits of memory, to give honest testimony—it is indicative also of the unimportance or immateriality of this particular meeting to the issues that were being tried.

7. It will be noted this is strong corroboration of the fact that the disclosure had been made in January and that

In any event, out of many meetings between these people on many subjects in this period involving not merely taxes, but a loan Lubben was requesting any one of the three could be mistaken. Busby's and Cain's testimony as to who was present at this particular meeting was as to an immaterial point. The fact that Huebner's present alleged recollection differs from theirs as to this particular gathering is still a difference as to an immaterial point, and certainly does not show perjury by Busby or Cain or, for that matter, by Huebner. Huebner's affidavit that "no one mentioned to him" that a disclosure had been made plainly does not contradict evidence that one had been made. In neither law nor fact does the president of a corporation (Cain) always tell a plant manager (Huebner) everything he has done.

The affidavit discloses that someone has drilled into Huebner the notion that a disclosure could be made only by presenting a document containing corrected figures. Thus, he says that the recapitulations were made "so that" a disclosure could be made. The fact that the disclosure per se consisted merely of coming forth and identifying one's self as having filed an improper return, that the Treasury always reserved the right to make its own investigation in verification of the disclosure, and that assistance by the taxpayer in making a correct return was at most in the work of assembling data, as suggested by Sauber, started soon thereafter; moreover, it casts grave doubts on the verity of Huebner's affidavit that he didn't hear of the disclosure until July, 1948. It will be recalled that Shotwell's books showed no "overages", while Lubben's, whether correct as to rates and amounts, did show them, at least for some of the periods for which Lubben's books were in existence. The information obtained in this manner, supplemented by memories and other data, was incorporated in the "recapitulations" furnished to the examining agents (R. 2814-5; see also Def. Suppr. Ex. 2, 3097 ff., particularly the columns headed "Memo Taken from Luben (sic) Record.").

the nature of a condition subsequent to the disclosure (Cf. Answer to Motion to Remand, pp. 28-29; see also footnote 2 thereof, p. 3), is one that has escaped Mr. Hudner and the prosecutors from who he apparently is taking his legal advice. But, "The simple statement that 'I have filed false tax returns and i want to make the Government whole', would constitute a complete disclosure." (Treasury Release, May 14, 1947, R. 3136.)

(3) That sometime in the late summer or early fall of 1948 Cain and Busby told Huebner the case had been "fixed" for a tax deficiency of $20,000, but that someone destroyed the settlement papers. While this carries overtones of wrongdoing, it has nothing to do with the disclosure question because, admittedly, agent Lima was assigned on July 30, 1948 (Dft. Ex. 15, at R. 3173, R. 321), to investigate or audit the company pursuant to the disclosure and had gone to work on the case.

Of the three items of asserted Huebner proof, on which the Supplement claims the case should be reopened, items (1) and (3), disparaging as they may be, obviously have no relevancy to the disclosure timeliness issue that is pressed as the reason for reopening. Item (2), while connected with the disclosure events, is not material to the issue and could not support a motion for a new trial. New evidence that might warrant a new trial (assuming the Government could move for one), would have to be in direct contradiction of something originally given at the suppression hearing that was vital to a decision of the issue. The irrelevant matter loaded into the affidavit may, or may not, be material to the new conspiracy indictment. But that is not this case, nor is that the issue before the Court.

With respect to Graflund, the brief states that if the case is remanded he will testify that it was not until June 1948, that he related to Busby what he knew about the black mar-rules in criminal cases which are applicable to convicted defendants merely embody a policy against piecemeal and endless litigation which is found in every type of judicial proceeding, criminal or civil, jury or nonjury. And every litigant, be he a private person or the Government, who seeks a new judicial determination on the grounds of newly discovered evidence, must meet substantially the same tests which a person convicted of crime must meet:

Moore's Federal Practice (2d Ed.), Vol. 6, p. 3785, says with reference to a civil jury case:

> "To warrant a new trial the evidence must not have been known to the movant at the time of the trial; and moreover, the movant must have been excusably ignorant of the facts, i. e., the evidence must be such that it was not discoverable by diligent search."

At p. 3787:

> "In general, a new trial is not warranted unless the evidence, if it had been presented at the former trial, would probably have produced a different result. Evidence, therefore, that is merely cumulative or whose only effect is to contradict or attack the credibility of witnesses will ordinarily not warrant a new trial, in the absence of very unusual or extraordinary circumstances."

The author further points out that the same rules prevail where one seeks a new trial on this ground in a nonjury civil case (Vol. 6, p. 3771, note 13).

In Marshall's U. S. Auto Supply v. Cashman, 10 Cir., 111 F. 2d 140, 142, the Court said:

> "A motion for new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence must show that the evidence was discovered since the trial, must show facts from which the Court may infer reasonable diligence on the part of the movant; must show that the evidence is not merely cumulative or impeaching; must show that it is material; and must show that it is of such char> acter that on a new trial such evidence will probably produce a different result."

In Brown v. Schwartz, 5 Cir., 164 F. 2d 151, 152, the Court said:

> "She [the Appellee] invokes the settled rules of state and federal courts alike; * * * (2) that a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence may not be granted unless (a) the facts discovered are of such nature that they will probably change the result if a new trial is granted; (b) they must have been discovered since the trial and could not by the exercise of due diligence have been discovered earlier; (c) they are not merely cumulative or impeaching."

In discussing the claim for a new trial on the grounds of perjury committed on behalf of the prevailing party, the Court, in Glade v. Allied Electric Products, 7 Cir., 135 F. 2d 590, said at p. 591:

> "It certainly cannot be said as a matter of law that a new trial ought to be granted whenever an affidavit is made that testimony used against the losing party at the trial or in a related proceeding was perjured, for the mischief of endless litigation would far outweigh any advantage which would be gained thereby."

Other authorities to the same effect might be multiplied. But the foregoing are sufficient to dispel any notion that only persons convicted of crime are subject to stringent rules when they seek a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence. The rule is substantially the same whenever a party seeks a new determination, whether it be by a jury or by a court.

Certainly, a seriously injured plaintiff, for example, who has lost his claim because of alleged perjury on the part of the defendant, who seeks a new trial on the ground of new evidence, should meet with as warm, if not a more sympathetic response from the Court than should the prosecuting arm of the Government, which is making the same type of claim in an effort to send people to the penitentiary. The same can be said of an alleged patent infringer where the patentee has obtained a finding of invention from the Court on testimony allegedly perjured.

A claim for a new judicial determination on the basis of newly discovered evidence is a disfavored one in whatever branch of litigation it is made. The claim of "perjury", and others of a similar nature, are so frequently advanced by losing litigants that they are always viewed with suspicion. There must be an end to litigation sometime, and this is even more true in a criminal case where liberty is at stake than in most others.

This policy has peculiar application here, in view of the fact that this case has already been pending in this Court for over two years while the Government has leisurely investigated and reinvestigated, and has been able to come up with nothing better than questionable evidence perhaps tending to impeach a small part of the testimony of one of the participants in the disclosure.

There is a final observation with respect to counsel's effort to escape the established and salutary rules with respect to granting new trials, or new determinations, on grounds of newly discovered evidence, that merits consideration because its utter speciousness betrays the incurable weakness of the motion. The Government's brief states (p. 37):

> "Moreover, this is clearly not a case where one party, having failed to convince a court of the soundness of this position, seeks to remand merely to bolster his case by additional evidence. Rather, what the Government in essence seeks here is an opportunity to have excised from the record respondents' perjury."

If excising so-called "perjury" from the record in a trial court in order to reobtain or reaffirm the order (denying suppression) already entered in that court, and which it is hoped will pass review after the "excision", is not bolstering one's case, then there is no such thing. One's case may be "bolstered" by affirmatively adding to one's own evidence or by taking away or detracting from that of one's opponent.

Let there be no mistake: all that is sought is a chance for the prosecution to hang on to a trial court conviction and to bolster a record that was not good enough to sustain it—a record on which certiorari has been denied.

Counsel's protests that they are not seeking to bolster their case by additional evidence serves only to emphasize that that is precisely what they are trying to do. Indeed, their brief (p. 27 ff.) asserts that if the motion is granted, Huebner, who did not testify at all, will now testify thus and so; that Graflund, who testified but briefly (R. 383-389), will now testify as to such and such additional facts; that Agent Lima, who testified but briefly (R. 319-26), will now testify to such and such additional facts. Logic simply will not tolerate the false excuse that because the Government is not seeking to bolster its case by additional evidence it may be excused from the usual rules pertaining to motions for a new trial (assuming arguendo it can make such a motion at all).

For counsel to assert, as they do (pp. 27-30), that if the motion is granted they will produce certain additional evidence, and to deny on page 37 that they are seeking to bolster their record with additional evidence, gives away their whole argument.

In this same vein the suggestion is made (Br. p. 34) that, since respondents had the burden of proof on the motion to suppress, the Government would clearly prevail on the supposed new hearing if not more were to occur there than striking from the record the testimony as to the time of disclosure, if it is found to be perjurious. But "striking from the record" or "excising" testimony does not occur automatically. What would be involved would be a whole new trial of the issue as to suppression, with witnesses examined and cross-examined as to whether Busby, for example, was correct when he said Graflund discussed the over-ceiling payments with him on the New York trip in January, 1948, or whether Graflund was correct in saying that the first discussion did not occur until in June, etc., etc. This is far from an automatic obliteration of testimony. It is putting in "bolstering" evidence to overcome evidence already in the record.

We respectfully suggest that the counsel would not go to such extreme lengths in attempting to minimize what they are asking for if they could truly defend it. They clearly are seeking a new trial, or a new determination, in the broadest sense of the word on both legal and factual issues. That is a thing that never has been permitted and, if it ever is permitted, will open the door for executive and administrative tyranny.

IV.

THE GOVERNMENT HAS NOT BEEN DILIGENT.

One of the hornbook requirements for a new trial on the grounds of newly discovered evidence is that the evidence should not have been previously discoverable and should have been diligently sought and diligently presented. Apply this to the present contention that the motion should be granted because of supposedly newly discovered evidence to be given by Huebner, Graflund and Revenue Agent Lima.

Huebner was a defendant; we will concede that his evidence was not available to the prosecutors in 1952. But Graflund was not a defendant and was not in the employ of the Shotwell Company in either 1952 or 1953. He was available to the Government and was interviewed and examined. Revenue Agent Lima was at the beck and call of the Treasury at all times. It is little short of farcical to say that the evidence of these people was not available and could not have been produced.

In our "Reply to Supplement to Motion to Remand" we asserted that the Department of Justice, rather than being diligent and frank, had been playing cat and mouse with the defendants and with the court (p. 10). We suggest that everything there said is borne out by what has now occurred:

The chronology attached to the brief shows that Huebner and Graflund testified before the 1956 Grand Jury on August 21 to 30, 1956, and that a "series of conferences with Government attorneys continued"; that Graflund again testified before the Grand Jury on February 20, 1957. Nevertheless, the motion was first presented on the wholly improper hearsay affidavits of lawyers and Treasury operatives. The Huebner affidavit was not presented until January 9, 1957; the Graflund affidavit not until August 19, 1957. It is obvious that the affidavits could have been presented at any time after the first of September, 1956. An affidavit from agent Lima could have been produced at any time, but such has not yet been done. Instead we find the first reference to Lima is the naked assertion of counsel in their present brief that if a new trial is granted Lima will testify thus and so.

Such tactics should not be tolerated and would not be tolerated by the Department if they were indulged in by a citizen seeking to void a conviction. No private litigant who seeks a new determination on the ground of newly discovered evidence is allowed to harbor evidence for months and years and then claim it as newly discovered. Yet that is what has occurred here.

V.

IF A MOTION OF THE KIND MADE CAN BE MADE AT ALL, IT SHOULD BE MADE IN THE COURT OF APPEALS AND NOT HERE.

On February 27, 1957, this Court refused to review the case on anything raised by the petition for certiorari. The motion to remand, although filed while the petition for certiorari was pending, is independent of it and now stands alone.

Counsel assert that jurisdiction exists under 28 U. S. C., Par. 2106, which, of course, does give this Court, or a Court of Appeals, authority to remand causes, but that section is conditioned and dependent upon the fact that the case be before the court "for review."

We think the matter is governed by Realty Acceptance Co. v. Montgomery, 284 U. S. 547, decided under Section 701 of the Revised Statutes, the predecessor statute of 28 U. S. C., Par. 2106, and identical with it in all material respects. Realty Acceptance pertains to the power of a Court of Appeals rather than of this Court but that fact makes no difference because Par. 2106 applies without distinction to "the Supreme Court or any other court of appellate jurisdiction." The holding is summarized in headnote 3, which reads:

> "Section 701 of the Revised Statutes, providing that this Court may affirm, modify or reverse judgments of federal courts brought before it for review * * *, or may direct * * * such further proceedings to be had, by the inferior court, as justice may require, which section was made applicable to the Circuit Court of Appeals * * * does not authorize a Circuit Court of Appeals to reverse a judgment at law in which it has found no error upon the record, and to remand the case to the District Court in order that that court may reopen it after expiration of the term at which such judgment was rendered, for the purpose of hearing new evidence."

The Realty Acceptance case involved a question as to expiration of the term of the lower court which, of course, is no longer of importance under the virtual abolition of the old time term distinctions. But that is of no consequence on the major proposition involved here, which is whether a reviewing court (here this Court), which does not have a case before it for review, nevertheless is given authority by Par. 2106 to remand the case for new evidence. On that question Realty Acceptance v. Montgomery is, we believe, decisive. Note Justice Roberts' language at page 551, where, after reviewing several cases, he says:

> "* * * Nothing was there said to indicate that this court would order further proceedings below to attack or set aside a judgment entered on a record which disclosed no error calling for a modification or reversal. No authority is cited in which R. S. 701 has been construed as extending this court's powers in the manner for which petitioner contends."

It is established practice that motions on grounds of evidence theoretically discovered after a Court of Appeals decision must go initially to that court for a determination as to whether there is a prima facie showing that warrants a change in that court's mandate. See U. S. v. Johnson, 7 Cir., 142 F. 2d 588, 589, reciting action of this Court sending the case back to the Court of Appeals while it was pending upon an application for certiorari here; see also recitals in this Court's subsequent opinion in the same case at 327 U. S. 106.

We cannot escape the conclusion that the Department of Justice, being dissatisfied with its treatment by the Seventh Court of Appeals, is engaging in a polite and sophisticated form of forum shopping, and perhaps entertains the hope that this Court, not presently as familiar with the record as is the Court of Appeals, will give the Department's protestations of "material new evidence" more weight than it fears they would be given by the Court of Appeals.

CONCLUSION.

It is respectfully requested that the motion to remand be denied.

APPENDIX.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT.

For the Northern District of Illinois,

Eastern Division.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Plaintiff, vs. HAROLD E. SULLIVAN, BYRON A. CAIN, LEON J. BUSBY, ERNEST J. SAUBER, and RALPH R. JOHNSON, Defendants.	No. 57 CR 149.

INDICTMENT RETURNED BY GRAND JURY, FEBRUARY 27, 1957.

COUNT ONE.

The Grand Jury charges:

1. That from on or about June 21, 1948, and continuously and at all times thereafter up to and including the date of this indictment Harold E. Sullivan, Byron A. Cain, Leon J. Busby, Ernest J. Sauber and Ralph R. Johnson, hereinafter referred to as defendants, in the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, and elsewhere, did willfully and unlawfully conspire, combine, confederate and agree together, each with the other, and with the Homan Mfg. Co., Inc., formerly The Shotwell Mfg. Co. (hereinafter referred to as Shotwell), Frank J. Huebner and Patrick J. Grace,

Jr., and with divers other persons to the Grand Jury unknown, all of which persons, named and unknown, other than the defendants themselves, will hereinafter be referred to as co-conspirators, said co-conspirators being not named as defendants or indicted herein:

(A) To defraud the United States of America of income taxes due and owing to it by defendants Harold E. Sullivan and Byron A. Cain and co-conspirators Shotwell and Frank J. Huebner for the calendar years 1944, 1945, and 1946, by concealing, causing the concealment of, and continuing to conceal from officers and employees of the United States, including officers and employees of the Bureau of Internal Revenue and the Internal Revenue Service of the United States Treasury Department (said Bureau and Service hereinafter referred to as the Internal Revenue Service), the receipt, utilization and disposition of taxable income by defendants Harold E. Sullivan and Byron A. Cain and co-conpirators Shotwell and Frank J. Huebner during the years 1944, 1945, and 1946, in connection with transactions had during said years by co-conspirator Shotwell with one David G. Lubben, the Eatsum Food Products Co., a sole proprietorship, the Eatsum Food Products Co., a partnership, General Confections, Inc., a corporation, and its wholly owned subsidiary, Reserve Trading Co.

(B) To defraud the United States of and concerning:

(1) The exercise of its governmental function and right of ascertaining, computing, levying, assessing, and collecting taxes due and owing to the United States of America for the calendar years 1944, 1945, and 1946 by defendants Harold E. Sullivan and Byron A. Cain and co-conspirators Shotwell and Frank J. Huebner, respectively, and of the investigating, detecting and prosecuting violations of the internal revenue laws of the United States, free from bribery, unlawful impairment, obstruction, improper influence, bias, dishonesty, false statements, misrepresentations, concealment, deceit, fraud and corruption;

(2) Its right to and interest in the conscientious, faithful, disinterested, unbiased and honest services, judgments, determinations and actions of defendants Ernest J. Sauber and Ralph R. Johnson, duly appointed employees of the Internal Revenue Service, concerning matters affecting and pending in and before the Internal Revenue Service, and to have such services, judgments, determinations and actions exercised free from bribery, corruption, dishonesty, improper influence, bias, partiality, and fraud;

(3) Its governmental function and right to have the business and affairs of the Internal Revenue Service, in the consideration, administration and disposition of matters affecting and pending in and before the Internal Revenue Service, conducted on its behalf fairly, honestly, and free from fraud, deceit, improper influence, partiality, concealment, interference, obstruction and corruption;

(4) The exercise of its governmental function and right of administering justice in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, and of punishing violators of the internal revenue laws of the United States, free from interference, obstruction and impairment through the giving of false, fictitious, and fraudulent testimony before the said Court and before Grand Juries of the said Court.

(C) To commit certain offenses against the United States, to wit:

(1) The crime of willfully attempting to evade and defeat a large part of the taxes due and owing to the United States of America by co-conspirator Shotwell for the calendar years 1944, 1945, and 1946, in violation of Title 26, United States Code (I. R. C. 1939), Section 145(b);

(2) The crime of willfully attempting to evade and defeat a large part of the income taxes due and owing to the United States of America by defendants Harold E. Sullivan and Byron A. Cain and co-conspirator Frank J. Huebner, respectively, for the calendar years 1944, 1945, and 1946, in violation of Title 26, United States Code (I. R. C. 1939), Section 145(b);

(3) The crime of bribery in violation of Title 18, United States Code, Section 201;

(4) The crime of knowingly and willfully making and causing to be made false, fictitious and fraudulent statements and representations in matters within the jurisdiction of agencies of the United States, to wit, the Internal Revenue Service and the United States Department of Justice, in violation of Title 18, Section 80, United States Code (1946 Ed.); 18 U. S. C. 1001;

(5) The crime of perjury in violation of Title 18, United States Code, Section 1621;

(6) The crime of obstruction of justice in violation of Title 18, United States Code, Section 1503;

(7) The crime of violating Title 26, United States Code (I. R. C. 1939), Section 3793(b); and

(8) The crime of violating Title 26, United States Code (I. R. C. 1939), Section 4047(c) (3), (5) and (6).

The Grand Jury further charges that said unlawful conspiracy, combination, confederation and agreement was to be accomplished by the means and method and in the manner following:

1. During the course of the conspiracy The Shotwell Mfg. Co., which became the Homan Mfg. Co., Inc., on or about May 15, 1952, was a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Illinois. During the course of the conspiracy defendant Byron A. Cain was President and Treasurer of The Shotwell Mfg. Co. and its successor, the Homan Mfg. Co., Inc.; defendant Harold E. Sullivan was attorney for and Executive Vice-president of the said corporation; defendant Leon J. Busby was a practicing certified public accountant; defendant Ernest J. Sauber was successively Chief Field Deputy in the office of the Collector of Internal Revenue, Chicago, Illinois, Assistant Collector of Internal Revenue, Chicago, Illinois, and District Director of Internal Revenue, Chicago, Illinois; defendant Ralph R. Johnson was successively a Group Supervisor in the office of the Internal Revenue Agent in Charge and in the Audit Division, Internal Revenue Service, Chicago, Illinois, and Chief of the Field Audit Branch, Audit Division, Chicago District Office, Internal Revenue Service, Chicago, Illinois; co-conspirator Frank J. Huebner was Vice-president of The Shotwell Mfg. Co.; and co-conspirator Patrick J. Grace, Jr. (now deceased), was a practicing attorney in Brooklyn, New York.

2. During the course of the conspiracy there were pending in the Internal Revenue Service and the United States Department of Justice income tax investigations, matters and proceedings concerning defendants Harold E. Sullivan and Byron A. Cain and co-conspirators Shotwell and Frank J. Huebner. During the course of the conspiracy there was pending in the United States District Court, Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, an indictment charging The Shotwell Mfg. Co., Byron A. Cain, Harold E. Sullivan, and Frank J. Huebner as defendants with willfully and knowingly attempting to defeat and evade a large part of the taxes due and owing by The Shotwell Mfg. Co. to the United States of America for the calendar years 1945 and 1946. During the course of the conspiracy the April 1956 Term Grand Jury of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, a competent tribunal, instituted an inquiry and investigation into possible violations of the internal revenue laws and other criminal laws of the United States in said district, and into possible violations of laws concerning the administration of the internal revenue laws and the administration of the affairs of the Internal Revenue Service in said district. Said inquiry and investigation was a case in which a law of the United States authorized an oath to be administered.

3. It was a part of the conspiracy that defendants Harold E. Sullivan and Byron A. Cain and co-conspirators Shotwell and Frank J. Huebner, having willfully attempted to evade and defeat large amounts of corporation taxes and individual income taxes, due and owing to the United States by said defendants and co-conspirators for the calendar years 1944, 1945, and 1946, would nevertheless escape the payment of a substantial amount of said taxes due and owing to the United States, and would escape indictment, and if indicted, would escape prosecution.

4. It was a part of the conspiracy that the defendants and co-conspirators would conceal, cause to conceal, and would make continuing efforts to conceal from the Internal Revenue Service, the United States Department or Justice, the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, and Grand Juries of said Court, that defendants Harold E. Sullivan and Byron A. Cain and co-conspirators Shotwell and Frank J. Huebner received large amounts of unrecorded and unreported income during the years 1944, 1945, and 1946, and that they each owed the United States large amounts of tax for said years, by virtue of over-invoice premium payments in currency and other payments received in currency on certain sales of merchandise by co-conspirator Shotwell during the said years. It was further a part of the conspiracy that the said concealment and efforts to conceal were to be aided and accomplished by various means, including, but not limited to, bribery, obstruction of justice, the making of and causing to be made false and fraudulent statements and representations to the Internal Revenue Service, the submission of and causing to be submitted false and fraudulent papers and documents to the Internal Revenue Service, the inducement of others to make false statements and representations to the Internal Revenue Service, the concealment and destruction of books and records, the obstruction, impeding and thwarting of investigations, inquiries and proceedings of the Internal Revenue Service, attempts to terminate and suspend investigations and inquiries being conducted by the Internal Revenue Service, attempts to influence, impede and obstruct witnesses and potential witnesses, and the giving of and causing to be given false, fictitious, and fraudulent testimony and representations to the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division.

5. It was a part of the conspiracy that the defendants and co-conspirators would make and cause to be made false and fraudulent statements and representations to the Internal Revenue Service, the United States Department of Justice, the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, and Grand Juries of said Court, concerning an alleged voluntary disclosure purportedly made to the Internal Revenue Service in 1948 by or on behalf of co-conspirator Shotwell.

6. It was a part of the conspiracy that the defendants and co-conspirators would attempt corruptly to obtain a settlement of tax cases concerning co-conspirator Shotwell for the years 1944, 1945, and 1946 at a figure greatly below the amount of tax due and owing to the United States by said Shotwell, although such action would result in the defeat and evasion of a large amount of taxes due and owing the United States for said years by defendants Harold E.

Sullivan and Byron A. Cain and co-conspirators Shotwell and Frank J. Huebner.

7. It was a part of the conspiracy that defendant Ralph R. Johnson, in violation of his lawful duties as an employee of the Internal Revenue Service, would corruptly take actions and render decisions with respect to investigations, matters and proceedings pending in and before the Internal Revenue Service, and would aid in committing fraud and would allow fraud to be committed on the United States by the other defendants and co-conspirators.

8. It was known to the defendants and co-conspirators from the inception of the conspiracy that investigations of the subject matters of the conspiracy were probable and that the matter of the evasion of taxes due and owing the United States for the years 1944, 1945, and 1946 by defendants Harold E. Sullivan and Byron A. Cain and co-conspirators Shotwell and Frank J. Huebner would be considered, scrutinized and investigated by the Internal Revenue, by the United States Department of Justice, by one or more Federal Grand Juries, and by one or more Courts of the United States. It was from the inception of the conspiracy and throughout the course thereof part of the conspiracy and a principal objective thereof that the true nature of the conspiracy and the acts of the defendants and co-conspirators in pursuance of the conspiracy and in pursuance of the evasion of taxes for the years 1944, 1945, and 1946 would be concealed, misrepresented, and caused to be concealed and misrepresented, whenever and wherever it was sought by any governmental agency to detect and prove the tax evasion and the existence of the conspiracy, and that the defendants and co-conspirators would make continuing efforts to avoid detection and prosecution by any governmental body, executive or judicial, of the conspiracy and of tax frauds perpetrated by the defendants and co-conspirators, through the use of any means whatsoever, including, but not limited to,

(a) the obstruction, impeding and thwarting of investigations, inquiries and proceedings of the Internal Revenue Service, the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois, Eastern Division, and Grand Juries of said Court;

(b) the making of and the causing to be made false, fictitious, and fraudulent statements and representations to the Internal Revenue Service and the United States Department of Justice;

(c) the giving of false, fictitious and fraudulent affidavits and testimony to the said Court and Grand Juries of the said Court;

(d) attempts to induce others to give false statements and testimony to the Internal Revenue Service;

(e) the withholding of information from and the refusal to furnish information to the Internal Revenue Service;

(f) submitting and causing to be submitted to the Internal Revenue Service false, fictitious and fraudulent papers and documents;

(g) causing the concealment and destruction of books and records;

(h) obstruction of justice; and

(i) bribery.

Overt Acts.

The Grand Jury further charges that the defendants and co-conspirators, in furtherance of and for the purpose of carrying into execution said conspiracy, combination, confederation and agreement, did and performed the following and other overt acts, to wit:

1. On or about June 21, 1948, defendants Harold E. Sullivan and Byron A. Cain, in New York, New York, had telephone conversations with one H. Stanley Graflund in Chicago, Illinois.

2. On or about June 23, 1948, defendants Harold E. Sullivan and Byron A. Cain and co-conspirator Frank J. Huebner had a conversation with co-conspirator Patrick J. Grace, Jr., in Brooklyn, New York.

3. On or about June 28, 1948, defendant Byron A. Cain and co-conspirator Patrick J. Grace, Jr., had a conversation with David G. Lubben and one Samuel Davidson at the Riviera night club, Fort Lee, New Jersey, and defendant Byron A. Cain and co-conspirator Patrick J. Grace, Jr., asked and urged David G. Lubben to leave the United States for about two years in order that he would not be available as a witness in any tax case involving co-conspirator Shotwell and defendant Byron A. Cain.

4. On or about June 30, 1948, in Chicago, Illinois, defendants Harold E. Sullivan and Byron A. Cain had a conversation with co-conspirator Frank J. Huebner and they told said Frank J. Huebner to keep quiet, to let one man do all the talking to any investigating agents of the Internal Revenue Service, and that the less said to such agents the better.

5. On or about July 9, 1948, defendants Harold E. Sullivan and Byron A. Cain and co-conspirator Patrick J.

Grace, Jr., had a meeting and conversation with one Daniel Tobias in New York, New York.

6. In or about early July 1948, in Chicago, Illinois, defendant Harold E. Sullivan and co-conspirator Frank J. Huebner had a conversation with one Edward Urban and discussed the matter of purchasing certain business interests of David G. Lubben for the purpose of acquiring and destroying books and records of David G. Lubben relating to black market transactions and other transactions with co-conspirator Shotwell.

7. In or about the latter part of July 1948, and in August 1948, in Chicago, Illinois, defendant Byron A. Cain instructed H. Stanley Graflund and one Gladys Morrill to destroy or cause the destruction of records of black market currency received from David G. Lubben by co-conspirator Shotwell in 1945 and 1946.

8. On or about July 21, 1948, defendant Ralph R. Johnson caused the transfer to himself of the United States corporation income tax return of The Shotwell Mfg. Co. for the calendar year 1946.

9. In or about the latter part of July 1948, defendants Byron A. Cain, Leon J. Busby, Ernest J. Sauber and Ralph R. Johnson had a meeting and conversation at the Chicago Athletic Club, Chicago, Illinois.

10. In or about the latter part of July 1948, in Chicago, Illinois, defendant Byron A. Cain had a conversation with co-conspirator Frank J. Huebner, and said Byron A. Cain asked said Frank J. Huebner for $10,000 in currency to take care of and "fix" the tax difficulty they were in.

11. In or about the latter part of July 1948, in Chicago, Illinois, at the request of defendant Byron A. Cain, co-conspirator Frank J. Huebner delivered $5,000 in currency to said Byron A. Cain to take care of and "fix" the tax difficulty they were in.

12. In or about the first week of August 1948, in Chicago, Illinois, defendant Leon J. Busby had a meeting and conversation with Internal Revenue Agent Joseph Lima and delivered to said Joseph Lima a paper containing false, fictitious and fraudulent figures and representations respecting unrecorded and unreported receipts and disbursements of currency by co-conspirator Shotwell during the years 1944, 1945, and 1946.

13. In or about August 1948, in Chicago, Illinois, defendant Byron A. Cain asked co-conspirator Frank J. Huebner for $5,000 in currency as part of the $10,000 in currency which said Byron A. Cain wanted to take care of and "fix" the tax difficulty they were in.

14. In or about August 1948, in Chicago, Illinois, at the request of defendant Byron A. Cain, co-conspirator Frank J. Huebner delivered $5,000 in currency to said Byron A. Cain to take care of and "fix" the tax difficulty they were in.

15. In or about August 1948, in Chicago, Illinois, defendant Ralph R. A. At our office, Shotwell Manufacturing Company.

Q. And who was present?

A. Well, I was with—Mr. Huebner, Mr. Lubben and myself were present. And there may have been others, although I can't place them in there at this time.

Q. What occurred at that conversation?

A. Lubben had been advised prior to that conversation by Mr. Huebner that we would be unable to ship the quantities of merchandise we had been shipping to him, because of the acute shortage in our plant of corn syrup. Lubben contacted Mr. Huebner—

By Mr. Lockley: Just a moment Mr. Cain, I object to any recitation of hearsay by Mr. Cain.

By the Court: Yes.

By Mr. Lockley: What he had to do with this—

By the Witness: I am trying to bring out the reason for the meeting.

By the Court: Your answer wasn't responsive.

Q. Just tell us what occurred in the conversation.

A. Well, a meeting was arranged in my office and Mr. Lubben said that if we would ship him merchandise that he would pay us a cash overage on the merchandise and show us how to go into this market and cause corn to be delivered to the refiners so that the life blood of our business could continue to flow into it, namely, corn syrup.

Q. What was said about the rates of overages to be paid?

A. It may not have been consummated at that one meeting, there may have been two, but the deal was ultimately consummated whereby we started at a rate of three cents on gum work and five cents on chocolate items that were to be shipped to Eatsum Food Products Company. The money, in turn, was to be turned over to somebody in the Shotwell Manufacturing Company, which, in turn, was to go out for the purchase of raw corn.

A. We did, we proceeded to ship him merchandise.

A. That's right.

Q. And is the same true in 1946?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was there any other customer, who didn't have any quota in the base period, given the same amount or nearly that amount of candy as Mr. Lubben was in '45 and '46?

A. No, sir.

Q. And you say he only paid you premiums for this short period from—what are the dates again?

A. September or October of '45 until around July of '46.

Q. But you made pretty substantial sales to him, didn't you, in the months from January to August of 1945?

A. That is correct.

Q. And you continued to make substantial sales to him, didn't you, from July to December of 1946?

A. I think that's correct.

Q. And you mean that the sales that you made from September of '45 until about July or so of 1946 were the only premium sales?

A. That is correct.

Q. And the rest of them, you let him have without any premium whatsoever?

A. That's right.

Cain, as he then and there well knew and believed, was false and untrue, in that sales made to David Lubben from September 1945 to about July 1946 were not the only premium sales and in that David Lubben paid premiums on sales made to him prior to September 1945 and after about July 1946.

A. Well, I was at the Gotham Hotel in New York and I had called Pat Grace and asked him to have dinner with me. Pat is a bachelor and he likes to fill in the time, anyway, so he came down and we had dinner and went up to my room in the Gotham and a phone call came in from Lubben and he asked if he could see me and I said yes. I said, "Yes, Dave, come on over."

He said, "Well, what about meeting me half way?"

I said, "Where would half way be?"

He said, "There is a place on the other side of the George Washington Bridge called the Riviera."

I said, "Fine. I will be over." And asked Pat to go with me and the two of us went to the Riviera and took a table and later on Lubben and Sam Davidson came in.

Q. Had you met Davidson before?

A. I think the first time I ever met Davidson was in connection with the mortgage, which would be before.

Q. Now did they join you at your table?

A. Yes, they did.

Q. And was there a conversation.
A. Yes, there was a conversation.
Q. With four people present?
A. Yes, there was four of us, Pat Grace, Lubben, Davidson, and myself.
Q. What was said?
A. Well, we carried on a general conversation for a while, and then I said, "Dave, what is on your mind? Let us get down to brass tacks."

He said, "Well, I can have an opportunity of getting a franchise for a soft drink in one of the Central or South American countries." I don't recall what it was.

"And I am going to need some money." And he said, "I would like for you to come up with it."

"Well," I said, "I don't know, Mr. Lubben, but," I said, "it isn't concrete now, is it?"

He said, "No."

I said, "Whenever it is concrete, why don't you do this: You call Mr. Grace and if you have something that is concrete and worthy of consideration, I will think about it at that time."

Q. Did you discuss tax matters at that meeting?
A. No, sir.
